SAN FRANCISCO SACRILEGE

By WALTER R. HECOX

The evening of March 4th had been cool and clear, but as the long night drew to a close a curtain of moisture rose from the Pacific and drifted in through the Golden Gate to shroud San Francisco's North Beach with a ghostly blanket of fog.

For the most part the city slept. There were of course exceptions. On the Kearny Street side of Telegraph Hill stocking footed young bohemians darted from apartment to apartment in the Casbah, sipping forbidden liquor and indulging in strange, whispered revelry. Half way up Pacific Avenue a swarthy man known as Izzy Gomez moved his monstrous bulk along the battered bar of his secret establishment and beamed evilly at his assembled guests.

On Eddy Street a pint sized reporter whom people called "The Killer" stayed for one more drink while Shanty Malone locked up the back bar and prepared to call it a day. A block away a tired young woman walked wearily toward her tiny hotel room, her night's work done. Across the street a beat policeman trying doors paused for a moment to watch her progress and, after a moment's hesitation, shrugged his shoulders and moved on.

And over on Columbus Avenue, where the tortuous slopes of Telegraph Hill flow into a gentle incline a solitary man carrying a heavy bundle moved through the mist toward the massive church that towered over Columbus Square. A man without a name as far as San Francisco was concerned. An anonymous stranger moving with grim purpose toward his appointment with destiny . . . and death.

Within the church eight men, none of whom knew what he looked like, awaited his arrival. They sat in ambush with ready guns as they had for many nights before, because while they could not describe the man they knew what his package contained. And they did not approve. The eight silent men who guarded the altar at SS. Peter and Paul's were firmly convinced that nitroglycerine has no place in a church. The stranger drew nearer, turning up Filbert Street and moving rapidly toward the entrance of the giant edifice.

LOUIS DE MATTEI

In Columbus Square a shapeless lump on a park bench stirred, stretched, and became a man who stared curiously at the stranger. His right hand waved erratically and for no apparent reason.

Another man, seated in an apartment house next to the church caught the gesture and turned his attention to a carefully placed mirror. The reflection let him see the stranger, and a second man, walking down the middle of Filbert Street. He too moved toward the church and conversed briefly with the man who held the package. When he had crossed the street and taken a watchful position there, the stranger laid down his package, placing it carefully where it would do the most damage. He lit a match which sputtered weakly in the fog and went out. The second match he cupped in his hands carefully until it burned brightly. He leaned over. A fuse sputtered. The stranger turned to run. Corporal Larry McNerny shoved his revolver from his place of concealment and shouted "Halt!" And while the fuse burned brightly between the pair, the stranger drew a gun of his own.

The dramatic nightmare which had terrorized San Francisco's North Beach for more than a year was about to end.

The first bomb had exploded early on the morning of January 26th the preceding year, powdering the moist air of the North Beach with a fine spray of plaster and concrete. It was not a big bomb. Not in comparison with those to come, but the explosion was violent enough to shatter windows for blocks around and bring the bulk of San Francisco's Italian population into an angry awakening.

The calm which had descended over the Latin quarter during the pre-dawn hours erupted suddenly into a tumultuous crescendo of angry voices, screaming sirens, and scurrying policemen. All eyes turned toward the towering church on Columbus Square where the column of dust and smoke drifted up toward the mist masked sky and dispersed itself in sooty streamers across the startled city.

Another Officer Murdered

Quietly, but with a dogged determination not often matched in any kind of work, peace officers throughout the state are helping to track down a trigger happy burglar who shot and killed Policeman Francis M. (Jack) Rea of North Sacramento.

Rea, known affectionately throughout the North Sacramento area as "Jack the Cop," was shot in the head during a running gun battle with the bandit on the night of January 2nd, and died in a hospital 16 hours later.

ing on the case was reflected by North Sacramento Police Chief William F. Wilson, when he told the North Sacramento City Council:

"He was murdered by an unknown assailant while doing his duty. As yet there has been no arrest, but there definitely will be one.

"We're checking every lead we get. All of them, regardless of how insignificant they may seem, will be investigated."

This is what happened:

away as they neared the building. He ducked between two houses and Rea leaped out of the squad car with a shotgun and gave chase. Gassaway drove around the corner, hoping to head the man off.

The prowler fired several shots at the assistant chief's car, but failed to hit it.

He wheeled, and headed back toward Rea. There were more shots. Marvelli and Jones ran toward the sound of the gunfire. They found Rea lying unconscious in the street. The savage gunman

The lead in the investigation is being taken by Jack's fellow officers on the North Sacramento Police Department. Helping are the state bureau of Criminal Identification and Investigation, the Sacramento Police Department and Sheriff's Office, the Brawley Police Department, the Santa Ana Police Department, and others.

The intentness of every officer work-

THE OAKLAND MATCHES

Sunday, December 6th was the last shoot for 1953 at the Oakland Club back of the Zoological Grounds with over 225 shooters on the lines and completely upsetting the guess of the range officials who had allowed for about 185 of the shooters to bounce the long green for the days shooting. The day was a honey and the shooters were out for blood with Karl Schaugaard, of the SFPD taking the high score over Bob Chow's second place. At this time the Western Revolver Association has not announced the 1953 champion but will do so at their annual banquet to be held sometime this month approximately the 23rd. There the class winners will be presented with their awards as will the team winners. The pistoleers as they all like the awards "Appreciation Awards" sure bring out for their shooting trophies. This year the awards were little loving cups with Spike Spiken receiving a nice gold one for his eight straight year without missing a match—and that's a record. Ed De-

Mello, Wesley Lim and Evar Roseburg received their awards for seven straight years without a miss. After the matches there was the usual lucky target shoot and some of the gang had a heck of a time getting three shots on the paper—anyhow, it was a lot of fun.

Glad to see the scribes shooter, Jack Markham, out of the hospital where he went for a bit of hernioplasty (how's that for a word?) His shooting showed he should have had other things patched up at the same time.

Then there was the sad, sad tale of Bill Fung appearing on the scene with the nicest scottish cap any chinaboy could wear—on Bill it looked charming. Then Jack Chaney, he of Irish ancestry, spotted Bill and it was a tuff go to keep Jack from using Bill as a target. The attached photo shows Jacks perpleixed look while Bill MacFung looks on quite placid like. Altho I noticed MacFung ducked out as soon as possible.

Phil Lanier, of Oakland, likes to take off each year to some distant spot and do a bit of hunting so this year he headed for Idaho where (he claims) the hunting and the finding, was perfect. Well Sunday, out pops an old timer in the personage of Al Friend who had also spent his vacation hunting in the wilds of Idaho. That finished the shooting for Phil and when I left late in the afternoon there were the two old liars sitting on a bench going thru the motions of how they killed bears, buffalos, wild-cats, lions—oops—no, not lions. Anyhow it was some bull session—and I do mean BULL!!!

MARYSVILLE 1850-1954

The City of Marysville received its name 103 years ago when the citizens of the new community at the confluence of the Feather and Yuba rivers rejected proposed titles of Yubafield and Circumdoro (surrounded with gold).

Instead the 500 to 1,000 inhabitants voted unanimously for the present name, in honor of Mrs. Mary Murphy Covillaud, wife of Charles Covillaud, one of the founders of Yuba county. A survivor of the Donner Party which experienced such frightful hardships in crossing the Sierra Nevada in the winter of 1846-47, Mrs. Covillaud was described by a writer in the Marysville Appeal in 1871 who declared that "never on the soil of California has a woman trod of a purer nature, more amiable disposition, a more generous heart."

Disaster struck early at the new city founded on what had previously been known as Nye's Ranch. On the night of August 30, 1851, a blaze originated in a Chinese washhouse on High St. and quickly spread to a conflagration which destroyed 80 buildings at an estimated loss of $500,000. A succession of fires followed in the city's early years, but the community continued to grow as it shook off the effects of its fiery baptism.

From such humble beginnings the city of Marysville has grown to the present day and now boasts a population of more than 8,300. Head of the chartered city government is Mayor Gavin Mandery and his four fellow-councilmen.

Mandery was elected for his first four-year term in 1952. He is associated with the Daoust Chevrolet Co.

Councilman Roy G. Cunningham, partner in Bud and Roy service stations, was reelected in 1952 to serve a second four-year term. Also serving his second term as Councilman John J. Murphy, who was elected in 1946 and again in 1950. Murphy, a former constable, has announced at recent council meetings he will not seek reelection next year when his present term expires.

Councilman Jack W. Iden, partner in Iden's Pharmacy, was elected in 1952 and served as mayor last year. Councilman Marion Bew, proprietor of the Lakeview Motel, was elected to serve a four-year term in 1950.

City Councilmen receive $5 for every council meeting attended with a limit of $150 per member for any one fiscal year.

Veteran city official is Phil J. Divver,

Jr., who began his association with Marysville in 1915 when he was a concrete inspector on the construction of the approach to the D St. bridge. Following military service in World War I, he was appointed assessor in February, 1920, city engineer in August, 1927, and superintendent of public works and grounds in April, 1946.

In his latter role Divver is in charge of some 25 street department employees headed by Foreman J. L. Cota and subforeman Homer Moore.

City Clerk Chester O. Gates has served since his appointment to that position in April, 1928, and also acts as deputy tax collector, controller of the budget, purchasing agent, clerk of the personnel board, and ex-officio clerk of the city council.

Mrs. Marjorie Ahern has been tax and license collector and deputy city clerk since she went to work for the city in December, 1939. Other employees in the city clerk's office are Mrs. Alice Green, who went to work in June, 1951, as clerk-stenographer, and Miss Maria Uriguen, clerk-typist since May, 1952.

Eugene M. Boyd, Jr., was appointed city treasurer in July, 1952.

Ralph L. Palm was appointed City Inspector in April, 1949, and since that time has been responsible for seeing that building, plumbing and electrical work within the city complies with the various ordinances. He is also charged with enforcing the city zoning regulations. Palm is assisted by Mrs. Mary Jane McRee who has been employed as a clerk-typist since August, 1952.

Police Chief Jack O. Blevins heads Marysville's 21-man police department. Blevins joined the force in June, 1942, and after service with the U. S. Navy in World War II was promoted to sergeant in November, 1946, and appointed police chief in January, 1951.

Serving under Blevins are five sergeants. Sgt. Dennis McAuliffe joined the department in February, 1922, and is now in charge of one shift. Sgt. George Galligan, a World War I Navy veteran, joined in September, 1926, and also heads a shift. The third shift is headed by Sgt. Jason Meek, a World War I Army veteran who joined in March, 1944.

Sgt. Nick Nicholau, a Marine Corps veteran of World War II, joined in January, 1943, and serves as an investigator. Also serving as an investigator is

Sgt. George Garcia, a World War II Navy veteran who joined the department in June, 1946.

Desk officer Leo Stein, joined the department in March, 1925. A World War I Army veteran, he has served as Chief of police. The other desk officers are George B. Darr, who joined in January, 1947, after Army service in World War II, and William McNabb, also an Army veteran, who joined in August, 1948.

Officer Dewey Allread who joined the department in November, 1938, is in charge of parking meter maintenance. Officer Charles Neuerberg, World War II Army veteran is assigned to the traffic detail.

Serving as patrolmen are Officers Truman Bee, who joined the force in August, 1941; Joseph M. McNab, joined in June, 1943; Almon O. Coleman, World War II Marine Corps veteran, April, 1948; John Gust, who served in the Air Force in World War II, June 1951; James Polmanteer, Army veteran of World War II, July, 1951; George Reusser, December, 1951; Richard Camper, July, 1952; and Donald Anderson, World War II Navy veteran, April, 1953.

Officer John Talley, World War II Marine Corps veteran, was appointed on a temporary basis in August of this year.

Officer Mary Allread serves as police matron and clerk, and also acts as interpreter in cases involving Spanish and Mexican prisoners and witnesses who are unable to speak English.

Another well-known Yuba County official is Dist. Atty. Joseph L. Heenan who was appointed to the job in 1936 and retained the position since that time by winning voter approval at subsequent elections.

Asst. Dist. Atty. Francis Arnoldy was appointed in 1941, and Marysville attorney James G. Changaris appointed last July 16 to serve as part-time deputy Dist. Atty. Mrs. Albert Arostegui has served as secretary in Heenan's office for the past two years. Public Defender Richard Schoenig was appointed to his present position in Sept., 1951.

Sheriff John Dower was elected in 1946 to the position he now holds after defeating at the polls C. J. McCoy who had served as sheriff for 32 years. He was reelected in 1950, and has publicly

SUTTER COUNTY CENTRALIZES

With a $500,000 office building of modern design ready for occupancy, Sutter county is planning to centralize its government agencies in Yuba City.

The new structure, on Second St. between B and C Sts., faces the old courthouse and the Hall of Records. The courthouse will remain in use by the law-enforcement divisions of the county government. The Hall of Records is slated for later remodeling and has been suggested as site for the county public library.

Housed in the new structure will be offices of the auditor, assessor, treasurer and tax collector, clerk, recorder, school department, welfare department, road department and supervisors.

The courthouse, with its present county jail annex, will quarter the sheriffs and constable's offices; superior and Yuba City District courts; Judges' chambers and law library; probation officer and district attorney's offices.

Sutter county's government is headed by an elective five-man supervisory board which now includes Marshall S. Davis of Meridian, District 3 and chairman of the board; ? Norred, District 1, Live Oak; Harold W. Moore, District 2, Yuba City; Edward DaCosse, District 4, Yuba City; and Eber F. Beilby, District 5, Rio Oso.

Albert B. Brown is county clerk, with Mrs. Beatrice Johnson, clerk of the court of the board of supervisors, as deputies.

Eugene M. Boyd, county recorder, has as staff Mrs. Bette Bell, chief deputy, Mrs. Frances West, senior typist and Mrs. Elsie Lathrop, junior typist.

Evelyn H. Chipman, county auditor, is assisted by Bertha Lantz, chief deputy, Ruth Paxton, Phyllis Chiappini, Lorene Johnson and Gladys Mills. The two latter are part-time aides.

Ernest R. Hauck, assessor, has a regular staff including Mary Van Arsdale, chief deputy; Mrs. Valerie Bell, deputy; Marion H. Hiesch, map-man; Arthur Hill and Gerald F. Allen, appraisers.

Tax-collector and treasurer E. Hanlon Brown has in his office June Hammons, chief deputy treasurer; Mildred Davis, chief deputy tax collector; and Betty Woodhead, deputy.

All of these departments will be in the new structure before the end of the year, if present plans are carried through.

Also to be located in the new building will be the supervisory chamber and private offices and the county road department, which is headed by E. E. Watkins, road commissioner. On his staff are Alvah Thorson, engineer and James Miranda, assistant; Patricia Lembke and Bette Jones, clerks.

Frank E. Willard, county superintendent, will establish school headquarters in the new building with his staff. This also will be the meeting place of the county board of education.

Cecil F. Pritchett, county welfare director, and his staff of 12 will occupy a suite of offices, approved by the state welfare department.

B. T. Berndtson, Yuba City, is official county surveyor.

The old courthouse will be revamped for new uses after general government offices are removed. Noel C. Stevenson, district attorney, will be supplied with quarters here. His staff included Chief Deputy John G. Hauck and Deputy Rezo Del Pero. Carol Neyens is office secretary.

William G. Thomas, an appointive official, as county probation officer also will be located in the courthouse. Mrs. Geraldine S. Boyd is deputy probation officer. With an advisory committee, this department is in charge of the juvenile hall and detention home in Yuba City.

W. G. Carpenter, sheriff, is located in the courthouse adjacent to the county jail which is operated under his supervision. C. Earl Blackburn, undersheriff, heads the list of deputies in this department. Included are O. O. Brown, H. P. Ollar, Art Myers, Ben Stevens, Mathews G. Wolff and Joseph Shea. Verdene Andersen is secretary. E. L. McCune is Yuba township constable.

The coroner and public administrator is Burwell W. Ullrey of Yuba City.

Sutter county shares with Yuba county in the bi-county health department, with Dr. Edith Young as health officer and in the veterans' service office, with Herman Kruithof in charge.

In the Sutter-Yuba Mosquito Abatement district, covering area in the two counties Thomas M. Sperbeck is manager. The housing advisory board operates three projects in the county, two in Yuba City and one in Live Oak, with Tolbert C. Elliott as executive secretary. The county also maintains an airport in Yuba City, located at the south end of Second Street.

The county agricultural department is located in another new Yuba City building, on Garden Hwy. near Second St. It was erected this summer. Offices, laboratories and space for inspections necessary under California's agricultural laws are included.

T. D. Urbahns, county agricultural commissioner, has held this position for 26 years. His staff includes W. A. Greene, deputy commissioner; W. C. Pitt, Donald F. Harris and Alfred C. Perrin, inspectors; Alice Willing, secretary. County Sealer of Weights and Measures K. E. Covington also has his office in this department.

The present city government with headquarters in the municipal building on Sumner St., is topped by the five-man council.

Joseph W. Sanderson of Anchor Motors, Inc., was appointed mayor by the other councilmen last April. Other council members are Howard H. Harter, of Harter Cannery; Lloyd I. Huse, automobile salesman; Riley W. Young, until recently a service station operator; and Raymond T. Butler, manager of the Sutter theater.

Matt W. Slankard has been Yuba City administrator since Sept. 1 when he came here from San Bruno to replace Lee Roberts, resigned.

Lewis A. Duncan, also an appointive official, is chief of police and tax collector. Members of the police staff include Gordon Phillips, inspector; Otto Kunde, sergeant; Frank Wamsley, acting sergeant; Donald Carlson, Nick Frandrup, Leonard Karley, Roy Kornmeyer, Archie Harmon, Robert Bumpus, patrolmen; Oliver Howard, poundmaster; Mrs. Marvelen Williams, clerk and secretary to the chief.

Police headquarters in the basement of the city hall contain the special police radio station with call letters KME-418.

The city does not maintain a municipal jail but uses the facilities of the Sutter county jail in the Yuba City courthouse under a special arrangement with the county.

announced his intention to seek a third term next year. Serving under Dower is a staff of nine deputies and two secretaries headed by Undersheriff John Murphy.

Unlike a police chief, who is an appointed official whose staff is picked for him, the position of sheriff is elective and the successful candidate on taking office is responsible for appointing the deputies who will serve under him.

Thomas E. Mathews succeeded Dower as County Probation Officer in January, 1947, when the latter assumed office as sheriff. Matthews is aided by Mrs. Mamie A. Mather, assistant probation officer.

Henry W. Drewes was elected constable of the Marysville area in Nov., 1950, and took office the following January for a four-year term. Clarence W. Harvey serves as constable of the Wheatland area, and Louis Marquardt in Comptonville.

CHECK BRAKESCheck your brakes before it's too late, advises the National Automobile Club.ANTICIPATION IN DRIVING

When driving, anticipate the actions of the other fellow and you won't so frequently find yourself in these tight spots that call for catlike reactions to avoid disaster. Anticipation is half the fun of a feast. It is also, points out the National Automobile Club, half the battle of safe driving.

KNOWING NOISES HELPS

The noises that a car makes are excellent clues to the maladies by which it may be affected, points out the National Automobile Club. As many of today's automobile instruction books indicate, there are impressive differences between knocks, squeaks, squeals, rattles, whistles, thumps, and so on.

HOME MADE BREAD

Until commercial bakeries were established, points out the National Automobile Club, quantities of home made bread were offered for sale in the open air markets of Santa Fe and other New Mexico towns.

DON'T OVERLOOK FRONT WHEELS

One of the places the car owner usually forgets to inspect for possible need for lubrication is the front wheel bearings, according to the National Automobile Club. It is true that when well packed this point rarely needs further attention for a considerable period, but this very fact causes many motorists to overlook it entirely for months longer than is good for its efficient operation.

USE DISTILLED WATER

Use only distilled water in the battery, advises the National Automobile Club. Regardless of how pure it may be no other water is pure enough for such use.

RENDEZVOUS FOR HORSE THIEVES

Ladron Peak, located south of Sabinal in south-central New Mexico, is reported by the National Automobile Club to have been the rendezvous for horse thieves long before the advent of American rustlers.

PISTOL POINTING

Hank Bowes arrives for his first shoot with the Sacramento gang and right away whaddaya think he sez? "Why don't they move them 50 yard targets about 20 yards closer?" Old stuff, Hank. Every shooter for the past 37 years has made that statement after his first try at 50 yards and I hereby predict that for the next 37 years new shooters will still be saying it.

The WRA assures me that this year they will most definitely send out their yearly score and average book. The gang likes 'em and felt a bit put out in 1953 when the club found it was unable to send them to the shooters—but this year —YES!!! The WRA would like the Clubs around the bay area to join the association (for unity is strength) and receive the monthly results so just send in the two bucks for the year's dues and the WRA will do the rest. And besides you also get a copy of my column each month. That's worth the 2 bucks alone.

Don't forget that the San Jose Pistol Club still holds their monthly shoots as does the Stockton gang. The next Oakland shoot will be in March while San Francisco will open in February. Keep those dates open.

Those WRA members who haven't the price of the new lapel button just out of the jewelers can find Spiken and he will trade you sumpin' for one. Spike loves to swap anything, horses, guns, bobby pins, fertilizer or anything yuh got to swap. Spike is living at the range, in charge, and can be found there daily a ready and a waitin' for barter, trade or just plain swap.

Our idea of putting the family to work is exemplified by Ed de Mello who had his young daughter standing behind him during the .45 National match retrieving the shells as fast as Ed could pop 'em out. Of course, after the match there was the usual cry and howl about loosing brass to some so-and-so who picked up more'n he shot but didn't cause any comment or excitement for no .45 match would be complete without its stolen brass scream. Wonder, if Ed paid the youngster for her work?

Elaine Hunt of the Monterey Handgun Club, in her second competitive shoot, confided that it's a lot harder to hit the black in a match than it is when one is only practicing. Elaine, young lady, you have just made the statement that oh, so-o-o many tyro's make in their early shooting days.

John Faleti has the right idea as he is bringing out his 15 year old son John, Jr., to do a spot of shootin'. From the start a beginners school and set himself looks of the kid's scores Sunday he should up as the teacher so a lot of us can get a few pointers. No wonder the old man has decided to quit shooting for a spell.

Oh, these new shooters and their troubles! There was our friend "Dec" Henry who had a slight case of mis-fire in the Camp Perry match with the inevitable results that he was completely discombobulated for the rest of the day and couldn't understand wot happen to all his hard practicing.

I just couldn't figure out who that dope with the gun strapped onto his back was. Besides that he had a great big, old nickle plated .45 strapped on his leg and enuf off size bullets to start a second class revolution, if the different sized shells would fit his firing pieces. He wandered around all day long asking questions and taking in the sights but to this day I'll be darned I don't know what it's all about.

There was a side bet between the Hiway Patrol Gang on one of the matches with Boomhower, Kolb and Harry Plummer giving the business to Milt Klipfel and trying to get his goat. The boys wasted their time as it was no dice. Milt didn't fall for their stuff, and went on to win the match and collect his just debts.

There will be a two day shoot in July over the 4th as the WRA would like to keep up the custom they so long ago established but let it slip for the past couple of years. This is a tuff one to decide as the 4th is celebrated on Monday giving the shooters a three day holiday and just how many would be there is problematic—anyhow, it's in the making. More about it later.

John Rygh (yep, that the right spelling RYGH—but don't know hows the pronunciation) from Berkeley, is still trying to get a double out of that 10 in the Camp Perry match. No one at the scoring table could find the tenth shot on the target, look as they might, but John said it was there and if John sez it was there then by God is was there! Nevertheless, John got credit for only 9 shots!

Most of the gunsmiths were sore as the devil because it wasn't raining Sunday. Being winter and liable to rain the gunsmiths gleefully pray for rain, rain, rain so the guns they get wet, jam and sputter and go out. Then the smiths gather up the guns, take 'em to their respective shops and fix 'em up again in great shape. The smiths, as I said before, weren't too happy with the sunshine.

I find a note jotted down among my notes about the El Morocco Motel in Sunnydale and can't for the life of me figure who, or what it is. After searching a bit more into my hen-scratched notes I discovered it's the way to the San Jose shoots. Just past the El Morocco Motel you turn left to the range. Simple, isn't it?

MOTORING TAKE-ALONGS

There are four important things every motorist should always carry in his automobile, says the California State Automobile Association. They are a first-aid kit, fire extinguisher, flashlight and a package of flares. Maybe you will never have to use them, but in an emergency any or all of them may save your life or the lives of others.

INSPECT BRAKE DRUMS

Automobile wheels should be removed for inspection of the brake drums at least once each season, and oftener if the car is used extensively, advises the California State Automobile Association. Neglected brakes may operate, but damaged brake drums result when lining wears thin and rivets are allowed to cut grooves in the drums.

WIPER CHECK-UP

It is advisable to make sure of safe, clear vision through your automobile windshield during the coming wet weather driving by having a check-up of the windshield wiper blades and the wiper operating mechanism, the California State Automobile Association suggests. Necessary repairs and replacements, now will prevent inconvenience later.

fense who spoke briefly on Civil Defense Communications.

Our Host then introduced DeWitt Nelson who stressed the need of adequate communications, and praised our group on the job they are doing.

State Director of Finance Pierce sent regrets at not being able to be present as did Commissioner Caldwell of the CHP.

The following visitors were introduced, Arnold Carver of the State Div. of Highways, Gil Johansen of the State Teletype System, Capt. Williams of the CHP and members of the State CD staff.

The meeting adjourned for a lunch served at the CHP Academy.

After lunch we were conducted on a tour of the Academy.

Vice President Art McDole reconvened the group at 1:30 p.m.

Tom Kelly told of a meeting to be held at Region 3 Control Center on the 11th, regarding matching funds. He then introduced Dr. Heslep who spoke on Radiological Instrumentation and communication problems.

Dr. Heslep and an assistant conducted the group on a tour of the State Control Center and the Radiation Laboratory.

The January meeting of Associated Public Communications Officers was called to order at 11:20 A.M. by the President, John Atkinson. Our host being Captain C. B. McMurphy of the Alameda County Sheriff's Department.

The minutes of the December meeting were read and approved.

The Frequency & Engineering Committee recommended the use of 155.67 mc to the State Office of Civil Defense for two temporary base stations to be installed in their mobile Communication Centers. On a motion by Lewis, seconded by Mayr, this was approved.

Mason then described the test to be made on 460 mc between Mt. Diablo, Copernicus and Blue Ridge Mountain. These tests are in conjunction with the proposed police and fire point-to-point systems.

Bill Whiting of Kern County described the latest earthquake in his area and how he was able to obtain reports on the condition throughout the county and Los Angeles by radio while all of the telephones were jammed. His Supervisors received a first hand demonstration as he was appearing before them when the earthquake occurred. He also gave a short report on the proposed state-wide micro-wave system.

Captain McMurphy then read the National APCO contents of Docket 10777.

The meeting was recessed for lunch at 12:00 Noon.

The meeting was reconvened following lunch and Sheriff H. P. Gleason of Alameda County was introduced and then presented Brower McMurphy, the new National President, with the National Gavel and National Membership Card No. 1 and installed him as National President.

Mr. Herb Breuer of the Federal State Market News Service told of the history of the Market News Service and explained its operation. He then gave a very complete picture of the proposed microwave system. A general discussion followed.

On a motion by Lewis, seconded by Burton, the Association went on record as concurring with the comment of National APCO on Docket 10777.

Membership application of Willard W. Wehe of Alameda County was approved as an active member on a motion by Keller, seconded by Hudson.

Nominations for all officers were again opened and subsequently closed when no further nominations were offered. As there was no contest, on a motion by Mayr, seconded by Hudson, the Secretary was instructed to cast a unanimous vote for all officers.

Bill Whiting then installed the incoming officers: Art McDole, President Tom Bayley, Vice-President and John Atkinson, Secretary-Treas. The Board of Directors elected were: Lewis, Maybee, Leboeuf, Keller and Freeman.

National President McMurphy gave a brief discussion on his plans for the coming year.

Commercial members reports were called for.

The February 11th meeting will be held in Santa Clara County.

As there was no further business the meeting was adjourned at 3:30 p.m.

KEEP GLASS CLEAN

A clean windshield not only improves visibility but is handy in other ways, points out the National Automobile Club. For instance, when it rains there will be no abrasive clinging to it to scratch the glass when the windshield wiper is brought into use.

When on a long trip always keep the rear window clean. Fast driving creates a vacuum that pulls the dirt onto the back of the car. A dirty window prevents use of the rear view mirror.

Side windows also should be kept clean for best possible visibility.

RAILROAD POLICE SANTA FE RAILROAD

Once in a while contact is made with a railroad Special Agent or Police Officer, but to the average person, little is known about them, the scope of their authority, duties performed, and where they operate.

Each railroad has its own police department, and each railroad has a different title for members of their department and the duties assigned them.

The AT&SF Railroad, better known as the Santa Fe, has officers from San Francisco to Chicago, Galveston, Texas, San Diego, assignment in proportion to needs of the service. Duties vary, from plain station duty, train yards, escort of prisoners or ailing passengers, investigation of missing persons from trains enroute, or investigation along the right of way of thefts, damage to property, accidents, and theft from freight shipments. Each officer must be aware of the state, county and city laws and ordinances within the district assigned him.

Each officer when employed in California has a 90 day probation period, and within that time a check of his qualifications, finger prints, personal history is made, and, if approved, he is appointed as a police officer by the state under Sec. 228, Sta. of 1901, and in most cases he holds a Special Police or Deputy Sheriff appointment within the city or county where he works, and cooperates with the department from which he received the appointment. Within the Bay Area there are members of the Railroad Police at San Francisco (5) Oakland (2) Richmond, (3) a Division Special Agent at San Francisco in charge of other officers are employed at Stockton, Fresno, and on up the line, with Investigators working up and down the line, who have no regular assigned hours or assigned beat duties.

Head of the Railroad Police in this Area, which includes Los Angeles, is Mr. John L. Hastings, Supt. or Special Service at Los Angeles. Each Supt. of Special Service has one or more Inspectors who work out of the superintendent's office where needed, or to take over investigations started by officers at different stations. In time of need, such as a wreck, disaster, or other trouble, all officers within the area are called to the scene. Officers from San Francisco are sent to Los Angeles, if an emergency exists there, or any other section on the coast lines, when needed.

Railroad Police of all railroads cooperate, lists of known pick pockets, baggage thieves, bunco operators, etc. are passed through the protective section of the AARR and forwarded to each superintendent of special service. They also receive and have on file all Federal Bureau of Investigation, Post Office and escape bulletins, as issued, with special bulletins from their own department regarding men wanted. A large number of the men apprehended in train yards or on trains are wanted by some department, and a large number of runaway boys and girls are apprehended every year.

Unless in uniform, you may not note the officer on duty, but there is one at all large railroad stations.

THE COP

By WALT MASON

No bard embalms the cop in song,
 Few people praise or toast him;
 What'er he does is always wrong,
 So we unite to roast him.

He is the butt of hoary jests—
 Can't name the time he wasn't;
 We damn him if he makes arrests,
 And damn him if he doesn't.

We cuss him daily for his sins,
 With criticisms haunt him;
 For every copper should be twins—
 He's never where we want him.

We blame him if some schoolboy hits
 Our precious little Willie;
 We blame him if the cat has fits,
 Or if the cow goes silly.

We roast him from crown to feet,
 The custom is contagious;
 And still the copper walks his beat,
 Calm, patient, and courageous.

He guards the traffic in great style,
 From blockades and congestions;
 And answers with a kindly smile
 Five million silly questions.

He hunts the bad man and the yegg,
 He walks all night with dangers;
 And gets a bullet in the leg,
 Pursuing deadly strangers.

He seeks in dark and noisome lairs,
 The burglar who eschews him;
 And in our cozy rocking chairs,
 We sit up and abuse him.

When those who roast him daunted stand,
 In times of strife and riot,
 He takes his life and club in hand,
 And scraps for peace and quiet.

ACCIDENT RATE UP

Traffic accidents in San Francisco decreased 2.2 per cent in 1953 as compared with 1952. There was, however, one more death in 1953 than in the previous year, with pedestrians again accounting for the majority of the fatalities, according to Iver C. Larson, executive vice president of the San Francisco Chapter, National Safety Council.

There were 17,004 reported accidents in 1953, compared to 17,399 the year before, or a drop of 395. The greatest decline was in accidents involving a collision of two or more motor vehicles, a drop of 281. Progress was also made toward reducing accidents involving motor vehicles and pedestrians. This type of accident showed a drop of 82.

Almost every one of the twelve major categories of accidents showed appreciable declines—with the exception of motor vehicles striking bicycles and motor vehicles overturned in roadways. There were 19 more auto-bicycle accidents and 72 more vehicles overturned than in 1952. Police attribute the latter mishaps mostly to excessive speeding.

San Francisco had 67 traffic fatalities in 1953, one more than the previous year. Pedestrian deaths totaled 43—the same as 1952.

Persons killed in motor vehicles colliding with other motor vehicles dropped from 18 in 1952 to ten in 1953, while there were six deaths in 1953 resulting from automobiles overturning in the roadway or running off the roadway, as compared with none in 1952. Motor vehicles striking fixed objects resulted in seven deaths, an increase of three over 1952; and motor vehicles striking other objects, such as construction areas, accounted for one death.

"In view of the fact that almost all types of accidents decreased in 1953, we have been greatly concerned with the increase of accidents involving bicycles and automobiles, and automobiles overturning due to fast and reckless driving," Larson said.

"The National Safety Council, the San Francisco Junior Chamber of Commerce, California State Automobile Association and other agencies are currently cooperating the a "Lite-A-Bike campaign to cut bicycle accidents. Safety pamphlets and strips of Scotchlite reflector tape are being distributed free through the San Francisco License Bureau to all bicycle owners.

"Police are effectively reducing the speeding hazard with increased patrols of Golden Gate Park and other areas in the city where accidents resulting in overturned cars have been most frequent," Larson stated.

THEY CALLED HIM "LUCKY"

From the talk one hears about the so called "perfect crime" it is obvious that most people do not realize there are a great many unsolved murders mouldering in the files of the larger police departments throughout the country.

By the same token it is obvious that the man on the street is not aware that there are a great many homicides which do not rate a one paragraph story in the pages of the bustling metropolitan press. When, at the year's end, he reads a roundup story which tells him there were thirty-one murders in San Francisco during the past year he assumes, subconsciously, that he read or heard about all forty-one killings.

LIEUTENANT MARTIN LEE

He will never know how wrong he is. Less than half of the murders which take place in this nation's larger cities ever rate a line in the newspapers, and the majority of these receive little attention. It is an axiom with all city editors that a murder, in order to be worthy of attention, must have that intangible something known as "class."

Because of this many of the most fascinating tales in the files of every homicide detail are, like Sir Thomas Grey's flowers, "born to blush unseen."

The murder of Phyllis Aguon had little to offer in the nature of class in spite of its bizarre nature. The death of the shapely brunette was just good enough to rate page one on the early street sales editions of the afternoon papers and unimportant enough to be forgotten the next day. But there are two men who will never forget the murder of Phyllis Aguon. Lieutenant Martin Lee and Inspector Alvin Corrasa of the San Francisco Police Department Inspectors' Bureau frequently recall the case which ran them ragged for almost a year and finally ended on the trail of a Marine with the fantastically appropriate nickname of "Lucky."

No one who rolled out to the Divisadero Street apartment house that night is likely to forget the body they found lying at the foot of a dimly lighted stairway. Phyllis Aguon was moderately attractive from the shoulders up, but her statueque body was beautiful by any standards and lying there on her back, wearing only a silken slip which was tightly knotted around her neck, she left a lasting impression.

It was almost three o'clock in the morning when the original call was relayed to the Northern Station patrol car. A latecomer to the Divisadero Street apartment house had reported a drunk blocking a doorway and the two officers were sent to investigate. Not many moments later the bewildered complainant was attempting to explain to the police just how he had managed to stumble over the murdered body of a nude woman and not recognize her as such, no matter how dark it was. He was a good starting point for the investigation by Lee and Corrasa when they arrived on the scene, but as a suspect he lasted only until a doctor was able to estimate the time the woman had been dead. The fact that she had been dead almost two hours before discovery provided him a perfect alibi . . . and made every one else in the apartment house a suspect.

The whole case worked that way. Incredible as it seems, every resident in that Divisadero Street apartment house was able to account for his actions at the time Phyllis Aguon was murdered and all of them had an alibi. Lee and Corrasa had their work cut out.

Days passed while the detectives investigated every facet in the life of the murdered woman. Every acquaintance was questioned. All her relatives were contacted. Physical evidence . . . the pathologist's report, fingerprints and photographs . . . were examined and re-examined. Slowly the picture came into focus. Every clue, each lead, pointed to a red headed Marine, whom a lot of people new as Lucky as the logical killer.

Relatives of Phyllis Aguon identified Lucky as the man who had visited her home town, a suburb of San Francisco, with her on the day before the fatal interval on the doorstep. Tavern owners in San Francisco remembered Phyllis had been seen with Lucky on that last, fatal evening. Friends remembered meeting Phyllis and her handsome, red haired Marine. There was the group of people who had seen Phyllis and her boy friend argue as the small hours approached who had actually seen him strike the shapely brunette and heard him threaten to throttle her.

While the investigation developed, one major flaw appeared in the detectives' case. A lot of people knew Lucky, and a lot more were sure they would recognize him if they saw him again. But no one knew his proper name. He was known as Lucky and, as close as Lee and Corrasa could discover, nothing else.

The two detectives discovered that in a body of men the size of the Marine Corps there are a lot of red headed persons with the nickname "Lucky." They sorted them out and sifted them down. Photograph after photograph was shown to the witnesses who had seen the Marine with Phyllis. Weeks passed into months. Eventually patience paid off.

Members of the murdered woman's family recognized a picture. Other witnesses verified their judgement. Armed with a name Lee and Corrasa were able to dig deeper into the case and discover definitely that Phyllis had frequently dated the man whose picture had been identified. Satisfied at last that their case was complete the detectives told their story to the Marine Corps. The Corps promised to cooperate. Lee and Corrasa sighed with relief. Within a few days the case would be in the hands of the courts. Then they received the call from a Marine colonel.

"I wouldn't arrest Lucky if I were you," he advised.

"Why not?" Lee demanded. "We have a perfect case against him."

"Not now," the colonel replied. "We checked on Lucky. He had a little trouble a short time before the murder. He was restricted to his station on the day of the killing."

"But couldn't he have gone AWOL and sneaked back safely?"

"He could have," the colonel answered dryly. "But what sergeant of the guard would admit he got away with it? And what court would convict him?"

Lee sighed, thanked the officer, and hung up. He moved to his desk, closed the folder bearing the data on the Aguon case, and stamped it with large purple letters. "Case Inactive." Then he turned to Corrasa.

"Now I know where that Marine got his nickname," he declared. "Just how lucky can a man get?"

BUMBLE BEE "FINGERS" FEDERAL FUGITIVE

Luther Saunders was convicted in a Federal Court of a liquor law violation, but he jumped bail. When Deputy United States Marshal J. Harrison Roche paused to act as a Good Samaritan he recognized Saunders who thus landed at McNeil Island Prison. The poetry covering the strange coincidence was written by a friend of the Marshal.

—EDITOR.
How doth the little busy bee
Assist the roving copper?
By boldly stinging culprits
In places hardly proper.

"Twas a fine day last September
When U. S. Marshal Roche
Was driving through Los Angeles
In his speedy benzine coach.

He passed another motorist
Who was fixing up a puncture
But a busy little bumble bee
Arrive at just this juncture.

The sweating, cursing motorist
At his work was bending over;
The pattern on his pantaloons
To the bee resembled clover.

Upon these pants the bee sat down;
His sitting was not tender;
The tire fixer gave a scream
And bit clear through his fender.

The passing U. S. Marshal
In horror jammed his brakes on;
"This surely is a mad man,"
Said he, "Hear how he takes on."

Prepared to cope with anything,
E'en to a crazy beggar,
Right boldly forth he strode and met—
A fugitive bootlegger!

"Aha!" the marshal cried in glee,
"You naughtie bootie, come with me!
"And for a raiding partner—Gee!
"Give me the little bumble bee!"

A TWO WAY PROFIT

Having the ignition system gone over and replacing spark plugs that need it does more than insure easier starting in cold weather, according to the National Automobile Club. There is also another form of profit to be obtained in the impressive guise of gasoline economy.

SAFETY PRECAUTIONS

Problems of safety and safety education around the modern automobile don't start when it gets to rolling down the road, points out the National Automobile Club. They start much earlier, when the first bolt is being cast, the first fender shaped up. Safety and safety education, in fact, is one of the major operations in the modern automotive factory.

In the big plants around Detroit, crews of industrial hygiene specialists keep roaming about constantly on the lookout for metal fumes, dust, gases or other hazards to health. Safety specialists comb the plants from end to end searching closely for every dangerous situation, every dangerous mechanical process, and when they discover these they lose no time in eliminating them with safety devices, safety guards.

But the detecting of danger areas and the covering of them with safety devices and guards is only part of the job. Perhaps the larger part of the job is getting the personnel to make use of devices and guards, for people are often lazy and careless and it has been found that human carelessness is involved in more than eighty per cent of accidents. Safety experts are continually doing what they can to educate personnel in the proper use of safe methods and safety devices.

In spite of all the safety work men can do, however, in the way of accident prevention, accidents still happen and then the medical men have to take over. And in most big automotive factories they take over in a grand style. One company for example, has thirty-five first-aid stations and twenty-eight hospitals that are staffed by three hundred and twenty-nine doctors, nurses, X-ray technicians, first-aid men, and others.

Another company finds that during the calendar year its personnel make use of five hundred thousand cold tablets, fifteen hundred bottles of citro-carbonate for upset stomachs, fifteen hundred tubes of salve for sore muscles, one million seven hundred thousand aspirin tablets, and thirty tons of protective skin cream. That may seem like a lot of medicine, but it's just what it takes to keep the wheels rolling around an automotive factory.

PASSING

Never pass on a curve or when approaching the crest of a hill, advises the National Automobile Club.

PREPARE FOR SNOW TRIP

Planning a trip to the snow?

In case you are, the California Highway Patrol has some helpful suggestions intended to add enjoyment and safety to the trip.

"First," emphasizes Commissioner B. R. Caldwell of the Patrol, "be sure you include a set of skid chains in the car and pack them where they can be easily reached when you arrive in snow country."

"When you reach a sign stating 'chains advised' you have reached a logical stop to stop your car and put on the chains. It is very probable that you will find no other sign not too far up the road which will announce 'chains required.' This point will be the end of the road unless the car is equipped with chains," Caldwell said.

Motorists are warned that even with chains an automobile is difficult to control on ice or snow if operated at speeds that would be reasonable on dry pavements.

"Another definite hazard in the snow areas is slick ice," continued the Commissioner. "This is caused by alternate thawing and freezing and is usually found in shaded areas. Watch for these spots and slow down before hitting them. Whatever you do, don't apply the brakes while traveling over such areas, and, if your car does start to skid, turn the front wheels in the direction of the skid."

"Enjoy the snow areas of our state but remember, driving conditions are much different than experienced in your normal driving," he concluded.

OVERHEATING

Sediment in the cooling system, or any foreign matter, is particularly to be avoided, points out the National Automobile Club. If anything of this sort lodges in the thermostat valve, the water may not circulate to the radiator when the engine reaches the proper temperature, thus causing the system to overheat.

STANDING TRAFFIC

Drive at a safe speed when coming up behind standing traffic, advises the National Automobile Club. In such traffic situations it is all too easy to misjudge distances, and misjudged distances can mean serious mishap.

WASH WORTH EFFORT

At this season the task of keeping the car clean is more difficult, points out the National Automobile Club. The extra effort, however, is worth the time or the cost. If the motorist is indifferent, renovation of the finish may become necessary.

TRANSPORTATION CENTER

The establishment of a national Transportation Center at Northwestern University has been announced by President J. Roscoe Miller.

The new Center will carry on a program of research, undergraduate training, and graduate study aimed at the solution of major problems in the highway, rail, air, pipeline and water divisions of the nation's transportation industry.

The Center is a joint undertaking of the University's School of Commerce, Technological Institute, and Traffic Institute. Several other divisions of the University will also participate.

An advisory committee of business and professional men interested in transportation will be formed to aid the University in the formulation and direction of the Center's activities.

"Transportation is such a vital factor in modern living," said President Miller, "that it seems desirable to expend the work of Northwestern University in this field. Because of its rapid development, transportation has become increasingly complex and has created many unsolved problems—economic, technical, and social.

"Northwestern University is admirably situated for transportation research and education. We have already done a great deal of work in this field, and we believe that, with adequate support, we can make a substantially greater and more effective contribution through our new Transportation Center."

The following have been appointed to the University Committee charged with the initial direction and planning of the Transportation Center: Stanley Berge, professor of transportation, and Leon A. Bosch, director of the Graduate Division, School of Commerce; Burgess H. Jennings, chairman of mechanical engineering, and Carl W. Muehlenbruch, professor of civil engineering, Technological Institute; George W. Barton, traffic engineer, and Franklin M. Krenil, director, Traffic Institute. Mr. Krenil is serving as chairman of the committee.

GOOD CONNECTIONS

Loose, dirty or corroded connections anywhere in the ignition system of your car can mean a loss of power and good performance, reminds the California State Automobile Association. If your car is sluggish or is using more gas than it once did, have the electrical connections checked first.

OFFICER MURDERED

police, the sheriff's office and highway patrolmen, started the most intensive manhunt the area had seen since a cowardly gunman shot and killed North Sacramento Police Chief E. G. Fish, August 11, 1935. (The killer Alfred Paine of Oakland, is serving a life term in Folsom Prison.)

Chief Wilson ordered a house to house search of the vicinity. With splendid cooperation from residents, he and his men searched, room by room, through more than 100 houses while the occupants sat huddled in the living rooms.

The murder weapon, a .22 caliber target pistol, was found near the murder scene, and quickly was identified as one of 24 stolen in a Santa Ana sporting goods store burglary. The State CII was called in to check this angle and the Santa Ana police pledged their help.

An all points bulletin was sent out with the killer's description: 20 to 22 years of age, 5 feet 10 inches tall, between 150 and 160 pounds, dark hair and of Mexican descent. He was wearing dark trousers or jeans, a brown jacket with a three inch wide vertical stripe down both sides of the front.

The police station switchboard was swamped almost immediately with calls from residents who thought they had seen the murderer. The best tip came from N. J. Jensen, who lives near the warehouse.

A doughty 78 year old, Jensen came upon the slayer behind his house minutes after the shooting. He seized the man, and tried to drag him to the front of the house, meanwhile shouting for an officer. The man slugged him, however, and escaped.

Unfortunately the house to house search, the running down of numerous leads and the other intensive work did not turn up the murderer. He still is at large.

But a lot of grim faced policemen, their hearts in their work, are patiently tracking him down. As Chief Wilson, said they will.

And what kind of guy was Jack Rea?

The record shows he was a family man, 48, who left behind a grieving wife and four children. His favorite police job was guarding a school crossing so the school children would not get hurt.

And none ever did get hurt during the years he guarded the crossing. He had been a policeman since 1945.

During the Summer of 1952 a fire levelled all the structures in the park where North Sacramento youngsters played ball. Rea organized work gangs of neighborhood kids and in double quick time had the ball diamond in operation again.

He was a founder, director and team manager of the Pee Wee Baseball League, a police department project for youngsters.

But aside from the record, what did his neighbors and fellow workers think of him. Here are a few quotes:

Mrs. Earl Myers of North Sacramento: "Three months ago my little girl (Barbara, 2) wandered off with her collie dog. Jack noticed the dog circling the girl and figured she was lost. He was off duty at the time, but he managed to get her home to us. He was just marvelous, that's all."

Chief Wilson: "He was a good man in every way. And I'm not just saying that because he's dead. He carried badge No. 1 and from now on that will be Jack Rea's Badge. It won't ever be assigned again."

Mrs. Lucille Chapman of North Sacramento: "He was the kind of cop who always tried to bring out the good in people. He wasn't always waiting to jump down your throat. He tried to show you how to do things the right way."

Mrs. Harold Keener, a neighbor: "He was such a good man with children. He was always helping the boys with their baseball teams and everything. All the kids used to call to him: 'Hi, Jack'. And he was never in too much of a hurry to stop and talk to them."

Mrs. Harold Penner of North Sacramento: "My boy, Keith, used to go fishing with Jack and his boys a lot. He was always doing things for the kids."

And Jack's grief stricken widow, could only say: "We will miss him so. We will miss him so terribly."

Only once before the night he was shot fatally did Rea draw his service revolver. It was in 1951. He and Chief Wilson arrested two men wanted for passing bad checks. While Rea was handcuffing one of the prisoners, the man hit him in the face, breaking his glasses. Rea, his face and eyes covered with blood, drew his gun. The prisoner gave up.

And that's where the best of all the quotes comes in. It's from Jack the Cop himself.

His brother-in-law, Clarence Carlson of Redding, said:

"One time Jack told me about having a kid in the sights of his revolver. He said he just couldn't pull the trigger, even though the kid might have shot him—he was armed.

"He told me the only thing he could think of was his own sons."

That's the kind of a man and a policeman Rea was. And that's just one of the reasons the killer is going to be caught and Jack the Cop will be revenged.

MOTOR BRAKES BEST

The engine is a good brake at all times, but there is one instance where it probably is the best, according to the National Automobile Club. That occurs when one has blown out a tire. Putting on the brakes to stop a car, especially if a front tire has blown, makes the steering job many times more difficult. If the way ahead is clear, the better plan is to let the engine bring the car to a stop with the brakes used as sparingly as possible.

BAD BRAKES

Bad brakes and bad driving attitudes can both work to cause serious traffic accidents, advises the National Automobile Club. If you would keep yourself safe, keep your brakes tight and your

TROUBLE FORECAST

Any tendency of the speedometer to vibrate should be met with an inspection by an expert on these delicate instruments, advises the National Automobile Club. The vibration may be due to loose unions or looseners in the flexible shaft or too sharp a bend in the latter. A lack of lubrication or incorrect meshing of the gears are two other prolific causes of speedometer troubles.

A MATTER OF VALVES

That bucking effect that occurs when picking up speed from, say, twelve or fifteen miles an hour in high gear, very rarely has anything to do with the condition of the clutch or drive mechanism, points out the National Automobile Club.
Nearly always it is a sign that the engine needs to be tuned up, from valves to

TOO LATE FOR LUNCH

It was Tuesday, June 2, 1953. Coronation day, in case anyone remembers. In faraway London the thunder of guns and pealing of bells proclaimed to millions of massed Englishmen that Elizabeth II had formally ascended to the British throne. A day of rejoicing in England . . . and a day when millions of American housewives huddled around television sets and saw for the first time the age old ceremony.

Marybelle McGuire might have been among them had she been present. The coronation was a page from history which the kindly, intelligent housewife might not have been inclined to miss if possible. But fate had other plans for the attractive thirty-nine year old woman that day.

Lowell McGuire was aware of the big event which was taking place half-way around the world, but it was insignificant in the mind of a nine-year old boy. He whistled discordantly as he followed an erratic course along the sun soaked hillside toward the rambling home on Vista Drive in San Carlos, California, where lunch should have been waiting. The warm spring weather which came to the San Francisco peninsula so reluctantly in 1953 had arrived with a flourish. There are a lot of things a fellow can do when the sun is shining and young McGuire was thinking about all of them as he made his way from the Britton Acres School to his home and midday meal. He had no way of knowing that lunch would be a little late that day.

Death, not lunch, was waiting at the dining room table.

Lowell McGuire skipped through the open gate, darted across the well trimmed lawn, and opened the front door.

"I'm here, Mom. What's for lunch?"

No answer.

"Hey, Mom. Where are you?"

Still no answer.

Lowell frowned and moved through the living room toward the rear of the house. "What's going on, Mom? I've got to eat and go back to school."

The youngster entered the dining room, still calling. The McGuire house was a large one. His mother could be anywhere. Crossing the threshold he caught sight of the flash of color beneath the dining room table. A bright red blouse, black skirt, and stark, white flesh.

"Hey, Mom, what are you doing down there?"

Mrs. McGuire did not reply. Not a muscle moved.

"Mom!"

Silence, after the echoes had subsided.

"MOM!"

Then he saw the darker red. The deep cardinal fluid which formed a sticky pool beneath his mother's prostrate body. The boy's voice dropped to a bewildered half whimper. "Are you hurt, Mom?"

Mrs. McGuire could not tell him that she was beyond pain. The boy pleaded. "Please, Mom, say something. Tell me what happened."

The continuing lack of response convinced him. Thoroughly frightened and pale with shock he stumbled across the room to the telephone and dialed the operator.

"My name is Lowell McGuire and I live at 557 Vista Drive," he reported. "Something's wrong with my mother."

"What is the nature of the trouble?" the operator inquired.

"I don't know," the boy answered. "Something's wrong. She's bleeding and awfully quiet. She won't talk to me. I don't know what's the matter with her."

The operator routed the call to the San Mateo County Sheriff's office who notified the San Carlos Police Department after hearing the boy's story.

Young McGuire had sought the assistance of neighbors by the time Sergeant James Edling of the San Carlos Police Department arrived. A small knot of them had gathered outside the McGuire house.

"Mother's inside," the boy reported. "I don't know what is the matter with her." He gestured toward the house. Sergeant Edling entered alone, and found his way to the dining room. One look at the woman on the floor told him she was beyond assistance.

Marybelle McGuire lay on her back on the edge of the rug, staring sightlessly at the ceiling. A dark splotch on her blouse told of an injury to the abdomen and the partially dried puddle of blood on the floor and rug indicated she had bled heavily before dying. Edling looked around the room.

The chair on which Mrs. McGuire had evidently been sitting was wedged between the table and the wall. Another chair, directly across the table from the woman, was lightly askew. Edling inspected the floor around the second chair. Two tiny brass shell cases gleamed brightly on the living room rug. The sergeant found the telephone and dialed Chief of Police George Seely.

"You had better come out to 557 Vista Drive," he told his superior. "Ben McGuire's wife is dead. It looks like she has been murdered."

Chief Seely arrived at the McGuire home in a matter of minutes. Edling greeted him at the door.

"Where is she?" the chief inquired.

"In the dining room. Apparently she bled pretty heavily from a wound in the abdomen before she died. From her appearance I would say most of the blood is drained from her. The kid had the best description for it. He said she was white as a bone."

"What makes you think it's murder?"

"Directly across the dining room table from her there are a couple of shell cases. Twenty-two caliber," Edling replied. "And a dining room chair is slightly ajar, as though someone had been sitting directly opposite her just before she fell."

Chief Seely looked the dining room over carefully. He studied the shell cases, then turned his attention to the rest of the room. A tiny mark on the wall directly behind Mrs. McGuire's overturned chair held his interest. He moved around the table and examined it, then turned to Edling.

"Someone sitting in that chair shot her all right," he said. "He missed with one of those two shots. The bullet is in the wall there. There's one thing about this that worries me though. This room is too orderly. The only thing that is out of place is that one chair where the victim was sitting. The other one is just pushed back as though someone got up from the table and walked away. Now how do you account for that?"

Edling shrugged. "There's only one explanation as far as I can see."

The chief nodded. "Whoever it was knew Mrs. McGuire well. She didn't expect any rough stuff." He paused. "I've called the District Attorney's office. Adolph Fernandez is coming over to help with the investigation. Don't move anything until he gets here." The chief sighed. "Now I've got an unpleasant task in front of me."

Bennett McGuire, a well built, athletic man in the early thirties, was in the gymnasium when a student approached him with the message. "Someone wants to talk to you on the telephone, Coach," he reported. "It must be important."

All the way to the telephone McGuire tried to tell himself it was foolish. A lot of people got called to the telephone every day. Why worry? But the basketball coach was worried. By the time he reached the telephone he was bathed in perspiration which was not the result of exertion. A hard knot gathered in his stomach. It churned with nausea. His hands trembled as he picked up the instrument.

"This is McGuire speaking," he said in as calm a voice as possible.

"Ben, this is Chief Seely," the official reported. "Can you come out to your house right away?"

"Sure, Chief. But what's the matter? What's happened?"

"I think I had better tell you when you get here, Ben."

"I'll be right there," McGuire promised. He hung up the phone, staring blankly at the other side of the room. "She's dead," he told himself. Marybelle is dead," he repeated. And all the way from San Mateo High School to San Carlos he tried to talk himself out of the idea. But it was no use. His wife was dead. He was sure of it.

Inspector Adolph Fernandez, investigator for the San Mateo County District Attorney's office, found a scene of controlled confusion at the McGuire home when he arrived there in response to Chief Seely's call. Policemen whom Seely had stationed about the property kept inquisitive children from darting past the boundaries and peering in the windows. At the driveway a little girl stood talking to one of the officers.

"But I'm Marilyn McGuire," she said. "I live here. My mother expects me for lunch."

The officer turned bewildered eyes on Fernandez and shook his head. Fernandez nodded and knelt beside the child.

"Your mother is too busy for lunch right now, Marilyn," he explained. "She wants you to go visiting for a while. Do you see anyone here you would like to visit?"

A young woman stepped forward. "She can visit with me. Would you like that, Marilyn?"

The little girl nodded doubtfully and was led away by the neighbor. Fernandez turned to the officer. "Is the mother dead?"

The policeman nodded. "Looks like she was shot. They're waiting for you."

Fernandez was greeted by Chief Seely at the door. The policeman showed him the scene, including the two shell cases and the bullet mark in the wall. Fernandez focused his attention on a second wall mark, then went back to where the shell cases were lying. A third cartridge case was almost hidden by the chair leg. He glanced at the woman's still form curiously.

"No sign of a struggle. Yet this fellow shot three times. The woman looks perfectly calm. The only thing that is out of place is her apron and that apparently fell to one side when she keeled over. Strange."

"You can say that again," Seely told him.

"Any sign of forceful entry?"

"We checked the doors and windows. If they were forced the guy was either good or lucky. There's not a jimmy mark on them."

Fernandez frowned. "And she's perfectly calm. As though she didn't believe the person would really shoot until she was dying. What do you make of it?"

"Just that. She didn't believe the killer would shoot. She knew the person."

"That's about it," the inspector agreed. "How about the rest of the house? Have you checked it?"

The chief nodded. "Everything is ship-shape. All except one room. And it does not make any sense. I'll show it to you."

He led Fernandez to the second story and into a small room at the rear of the house. It was obviously a little girl's bedroom and it had been thoroughly ransacked. Drawers, most of them empty, hung wide open, the closet door was ajar, and even the mattress appeared to have been lifted from its original position on the bed.

"Why?" Fernandez asked. "Why would the killer loot this room and only this room?"

"Apparently he knew what he wanted would be here and only here," Seely declared. "It bears out the theory that he must have known the family."

A tour through the rest of the house revealed that nothing else had been disturbed. Fernandez looked over the rooms occupied by the McGuire children and their parents.

"Two little girls and the boy," he commented. "I wonder where the other girl is?"

"She's not the McGuire's child," Seely told him. She's a ward of theirs. A distant relative, I understand. She's in a hospital now receiving some sort of psychiatric treatment. Apparently she led a pretty unhappy childhood until she came here."

"Maybe McGuire can help solve this riddle," Fernandez said. "He must have some idea who the killer is."

While Fernandez photographed the death scene and the ransacked room, Seely interviewed Lowell McGuire who had regained his composure to a remarkable degree. Aside from revealing that the front door had been unlocked and slightly ajar when he entered the house the boy could add little to the officer's store of information. A short time later Bennett McGuire, pale faced and trembling, arrived.

"Where is my wife?" he inquired without preliminaries.

As gently as possible, Seely told him about the shooting. The former athlete sank to a chair in the living room. He stifled a sob and fought for control of his voice.

"That's it, then," he said at last. "He finally got his revenge."

Fernandez had entered the room and overheard the remark.

"Who?" he demanded. "Who got his revenge?"

"Arthur Herbert, her stepfather," McGuire sighed. "I told her he was dangerous."

"Why would he want to kill your wife?" Fernandez demanded.

"It's a long story," McGuire explained. "It started more than a year ago when there was an explosion in Herbert's Los Angeles apartment."

The basketball coach explained that Mrs. McGuire's mother had been one of five women who had married the man. She had married him in 1928 and eventually he deserted her. Somehow he had remained in contact with his stepdaughter, Marybelle.

A gas explosion in Herbert's apartment on January 21, 1952 injured him badly and he had sent his seven year old daughter, Jerrylann to Las Vegas to live with his half sister.

Jerrylann had stayed there until it became apparent that the arrangement was not working out. There were three other small children in the house and the half sister's husband was invalided. At that point the McGuires, who had met each other while teaching at a school for handicapped and underprivileged children, offered to take the little girl.

To satisfy California juvenile laws, Jerrylann was made a ward of the San Mateo County Juvenile Court on May 7, 1952 and placed in the McGuire home. She appeared to be as happy there as she had ever been, but appeared incapable of adjusting to a normal life.

She was a pretty, blond child with an appealing personality. In spite of this she suffered from extreme despondency and self criticism which appeared to interfere with normal adjustment. She told the authorities she had been mixed up since the day she was born.

On February 23, 1953 the child was sent to the Hillcrest Juvenile Hall for observation. Although she expressed a desire to return to the McGuire home, she agreed to go to the Napa State Hospital Children's Clinic for further observation and assistance.

Meanwhile Herbert had become increasingly bitter toward the McGuires and had frequently demanded that the child be returned to him.

"In view of the child's problems, past and present, we have refused his request," the juvenile court stated flatly.

Herbert's resentment toward the McGuires increased. Frequently during the early months of 1953 he accused them of injuring his daughter. Mrs. McGuire's protests that the treatment was for the child's own good and that she would return to the McGuire home when her problems were solved only served to further enrage the man. Several times, before that fatal June morning, he had threatened violence.

"I wanted to call the authorities," McGuire explained. "Marybelle would not hear of it. She was the type of person who trusted and forgave everybody. This is her payment for that," he concluded bitterly.

Seely told him of the ransacked room upstairs. "Was that the little girl's room?" he inquired.

McGuire nodded.

"That makes Herbert our top suspect," Fernandez declared. "We had better get out a pickup order right away."

An all points bulletin was placed on both the teletype and police radio requesting that Herbert be held for questioning. Five states were warned to be on the lookout for the suspected killer.

Meanwhile autopsy surgeon Dr. Arthur Lack reported that Mrs. McGuire died of severe internal bleeding within a few minutes after the shooting. The bullet which caused death ripped through her abdomen and pierced her liver. A second bullet had grazed her neck and ricocheted around the room, and the third bullet missed entirely. All three bullets were turned over to ballistics experts for testing.

June third and fourth passed with officers in five states searching futilely for Herbert. No further developments were turned up in San Carlos. On June fifth the break came.

Sergeant George Sowards of the Los Angeles County Sheriff's office was wearily winding up his shift when the bespectacled, little man walked into the Firestone substation and asked to see Deputy Sheriff Ernest Foster.

"He's not here," Sowards reported. "He'll be in at nine o'clock. Do you want to wait?"

The visitor wavered, then shook his head. "No. I just thought I'd say hello."

"Who shall I tell him called?"

"Never mind. It doesn't matter." The visitor turned and walked out. He was hardly through the door when Sowards did a quick double take. He dashed out. The visitor was just a few feet away, about to step into his parked car.

"Wait a minute," Sowards ordered.

"What for?" the man asked.

"You're wanted for murder, that's what for," Sowards told him. "Come on into the station."

Arthur Herbert docilely followed the sergeant into the station. During a subsequent search Sowards produced a foreign make twenty-two caliber automatic from Herbert's coat pocket.

The bullets and shell cases recovered from the murder scene were forwarded to Los Angeles by plane and Sheriff's ballistics expert George Lucy identified them as having come from Herbert's gun.

Under questioning by Los Angeles Deputy Sheriff Floyd Rosenberg Herbert refused to discuss the shooting, stating only that he had been in the bay area on the preceding Sunday or Monday, rented a room and got drunk. He said he might have been in San Mateo, but couldn't be sure.

The suspect told a vague story of driving to Napa to visit his daughter and said, "When I saw my girl I blowed my top."

Rosenberg also discovered that Herbert had been arraigned the preceding Thursday on a bigamy charge. Herbert claimed to have forgotten a Carson City, Nevada, marriage following the apartment explosion.

A. L. Lamport, chief investigator for the San Mateo County District Attorney's office flew to Los Angeles with Chief Seely to question the suspect. After talking to him and examining the evidence Lamport declared that he was convinced of Herbert's guilt.

"His story is full of holes," Lamport reported. "He has no alibi and the gun is the clinching evidence. He can't get around those matching bullets."

Herbert was charged with the murder of Mrs. Marybelle McGuire and found guilty by a San Mateo County jury. He is serving a life sentence now.

*Mills and Yard at Scotia and Eureka
CaliforniaSPEAKING OF POLICEMEN

To speak intelligently of a police officer, as such, we must first consider what is expected of him.

Well, like a ball player, he must be a man of correct and hasty thought and action, for his errors are charged against him—and may even prove fatal.

He must be a man of tact and diplomacy, one who can assert authority with poise, dignity, and a sense of justice.

Like an actor on the stage, he must be able to step into any situation, and, by his personality, assume entire command.

By his every act he must be able to bring about in the general public a feeling of respect for his department; and personally be looked up to as a guardian of the peace, and a protector of the lives, homes, and property of decent people.

On battle fronts courage is a must; but retreat is sometimes commendable. The creed of the police officer is different; for him there is no retreat—he must get his man.

I have just finished reading a most interesting article on the police officer as a man, a unit, an individual.

The writer took each letter of the alphabet, in order for the twenty-six paragraphs of his summary on the required qualifications of a worthwhile police officer.

With the letter A he set down "alert," with a short explanation. Then followed B, for "bravery," C, for "caution," D, for "decision," and so on, down to Z, for "zeal."

I read the piece a couple of times, and felt, as I have on many occasions, that none of us humans are pioneers with an idea. Yes, that man took the words right out of my mouth—words that I could have heartedly uttered so many times since fate has had me work side by side with police officers.

Day in and day out, for many years, I have had a ringside seat on police officers at work, in every phase of their never ending routine. I have watched their efforts, and learned the underlying reasons of their successes as well as their truly heartbreaking failures.

I have come to definitely realize that the man wearing a police star is just a lone individual, sailing a more or less treacherous course, from the moment he takes the oath of office.

The police rookie must definitely be the man for the job. To state the case bluntly, I admit I thoroughly agree with my colleagues, whom I have heard say so in so many different words: A police department should be hard to join and mighty easy to leave.

The police officer is a man whose occupation is most difficult to define.

He is thought of as one of a group; but he isn't—not as a mechanic or a longshoreman, a letter carrier, a sailor or a soldier are correctly considered. These groups have definite, supervised duties to perform, but the police officer stands at the bat to take the pitches as they come.

On duty—and off duty—he is definitely on his own. Yes, he is a one-man army, with no reserves and no place to retreat to.

The uniform does not make the police officer even though he secures it through civil service rating or otherwise. If he is a misfit police officer he is a most expensive civic nuisance.

A police officer is always on parade—casual scrutiny by juveniles and voters a never ending object of much more than alike. Even his home life is much more a matter of check and double check, and gossip and more gossip, than that of the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker, or even the mayor.

People know all about his social connections and can name his relatives, his doctor and his grocer. They also know his hobbies and how much he owes on his house and his car.

So, being, as it were, a marked man, he must indeed be a sterling citizen to be able to play the part of The Village Blacksmith, and—"look the whole world in the face and fear not any man."

How can such a man be secured for a police department?

The problem is not at all simple. It demands time and care on the part of the selectors. They must first look thoroughly into each applicant's record. Of course, they must realize that a police officer need not be a superman. But they must not for a moment lose track of the fact that it takes a lot of worthwhile consideration to have the proper man fill a police uniform.

Physical and mental standards of a high grade are very desirable of course, but the problem for the small group of selectors is to find the man, the personality for the job.

Police service is rendered by individual placement on a person-to-person basis, thus the quality of service is determined by the individual men who provide it. A police officer lacking in personal qualifications is certain to give poor service and bring criticism and possible discredit on the entire department.

High standards of physical and academic and technical ratings, as determined by civil service examiners, rate about equal and first in the selection of rookie policemen.

The rookie gets a uniform. But, has this man inside the uniform the heart to go with it? That is the great problem the civil service tests leave unsolved.

There is always a way to solve human problems when we apply common sense.

For our bird dogs, our race horses, and our live stock we carefully consider pedigree as well as present appearance. The burning eloquence of our daughter, or the best presentment of an automobile salesman, will not quickly sway us in the acceptance of a prospective son-in-law or a marvelous looking used car. In such instances we do make haste slowly.

The would-be rookie wants a uniform. Naturally, he has already found he has the physical qualifications; and has also done some special preparation to insure his acceptance.

The prime duty of the police head is now to get personally acquainted with his prospective employee—to meet him face-to-face, for a brief interview. This interview he will conclude by handing the applicant a long list of questions to be carefully answered at home and then mailed to the police head.

An application blank such as is used by the larger public utility corporations will serve as a model for this questionnaire. Of course, many additional questions could be added, such as:

1. Schools attended—dates to be given, also names of teachers and reasons for leaving school;
2. Jobs held—dates to be given, also names of employers, and reasons for quitting or being dismissed;
3. U. S. Service—why, also account for court martial or reduction in rank;
4. Arrests—number of, and charges;
5. Divorced—why, and if paying alimony, or if taking care of parents or others;
6. Financial standing — paying on home, automobile or furniture, or outstanding debts;
7. Why applying for position as a police officer?

Some people are adept at filling out such sets of questions. But, sometimes they prove to have very poor memories, and sometimes they are very careless indeed as to the correctness of their answers.

The returned questionnaire will give an excellent chance for some close checking. Through a careful perusal of it by you and each of the three or four citizens comprising your appraisal board advance skeleton knowledge of the efforts of the candidate since he left school will be available.

Across the table from you and your selected friends you may suddenly find a candidate who has mailed you a complete questionnaire that is loaded with misinformation.

You may also run across a shallow bluffer, who, no matter how whimsical or ponderous a question you may put to him, will become more and more wordy, but will definitely refrain from just replying: "I don't know," or "I can't answer that question."

By this face-to-face, orderly meeting of the candidate, your appraisal board can judge each man from the standpoint of critical employers-to-be, as to:

1. His physical appearance, which though of no consequence in many lines of endeavor, is important in the case of a police officer.

2. His speaking behavior, which really is of prime importance in police work because of the fact that it entails such constant verbal contacts with all classes, both in and out of court;

3 His personal history, both in and out of school, and in U. S. Service, or business jobs, also his arrests, his marital and financial status, his lodge connections and his hobbies;

4. His aims and reasons for becoming a police officer. This will permit of many questions from the board concerning good jobs he may have had or business opportunities he may have passed up, when his academic or technical attainments are considered;

The man who lied in his written answers will need to bluster and bluff. The man whose active history shows he drifted from one job to another will have to be quite persuasive to prove his stability; and the candidate who has had school, marital, occupational, financial, U. S. or police troubles will certainly have to be a good attorney in his own defense to clear himself before the board. Yes, this face-to-face meeting is bad indeed for eager beavers and that large percentage of peppy, self confident drifters of whom it may be truly said: They labor not, neither do they spin.

It is gratifying to think that finding good material for a police department is not at all impossible after the civil service people have done their screening. The police head and his supervisory aides can, with no great difficulty, do at least a ninety per cent perfect job of final screening. Out of a group, soberly interviewed, will be selected and hired one or more normal and natural citizens who have steadily sailed on an even keel—men who, from their youth up, have shown that grand stability that comes from head and heart.

From his quarters in the adjoining building Father Orestes Trinchieri ran at the head of his little group of Salesian Fathers toward the church which was his charge. They were the first to reach the large hole which had been blown in the pavement at the rear of the church. The building itself appeared to be undamaged. The priests were making an inspection tour of the premises when the police arrived. Father Trinchieri greeted their questions with a bewildered shrug.

"How can I tell what happened?" he asked. "What kind of man would try to destroy the house of God?"

News of the bombing was the top story for the San Francisco newspapers the following morning and it stayed on page one of the city newspapers for days to come. The attempted bombing of any church would have been enough to arouse the ire of the city by the Golden Gate, but none so much as the attempt to destroy the building which watches over Columbus Square.

St. Peter and Paul's Church is more than just another place of worship to San Francisco. It is a matter of civic pride. The huge church, with its towering twin spires that pierce the northern edges of the city's skyline, was almost new at the time and considered the most beautiful building of its kind west of Chicago. Every San Franciscan, regardless of religion or creed, was proud of the structure. The demand for the capture of the bomber was instantaneous. But the investigation directed by Captain of Detective Duncan Matheson and Detective Sergeant Louis DeMattei of the San Francisco Police Department ran up a series of blind alleys. Lead after lead was explored and found wanting. Investigation of alleged members of the infamous Black Hand and Mafia societies led nowhere. Phony tips wasted days of checking. Then during the small hours of May 9th, the bomber struck again.

At 3:26 a.m. a bomb, infinitely more powerful than the first one, was set off in the marble vestibule at the entrance of the church, shattering several large stained glass windows within the building, damaging the huge, twelve foot portals leading to the church proper, and breaking windows throughout the North Beach.

For the ensuing hours terror ruled in San Francisco's Italian colony. Hundreds of the area's residents clad in nightshirts, pajamas and bath robes tumbled out to the streets and refused to reenter their homes for fear of another explosion.

Harried policemen from all over the city rushed to the scene. DeMattei arrived and found little more evidence than the first explosion had produced. The bomb, apparently consisting of dynamite sticks, had been bound together with wire and placed in a corner where the front steps and doors joined. A heavy woven steel and rubber mat had been thrown over it.

A few strands of wire and the disintegrated remains of dynamite sticks were all in the way of clues DeMattei had to work with. A door to door canvass of the area produced a lot of theories but no results. Father Trinchieri and his Salesian Fathers worked tirelessly in an attempt to assist the investigation, but without visible results. Days merged into weeks and weeks into months while the investigation bogged down.

October came. The bombings of St. Peter and Paul's Church were all but forgotten by everyone except the police working on the case and Father Trinchieri and his Salesian Fathers. Halloween approached. Grinning, snag toothed pumpkins leared from their window ledges. School children planned pranks to be played on the evening preceding All Saints Day. But the most monstrous prank of all was scheduled to be played two days before the night when witches ride.

Sunday, October 29, 5:15 a.m. The eternal fog lay heavy over the North Beach, dripping moistly on gleaming streets. A solitary figure moved through the sleeping city toward the church by Columbus Square. He deposited his package carefully in the marble vestibule, touched a match to it, waited for a moment to be sure the fuse burned brightly, then darted off at top speed into the gloom. There was need to run. The bomb which exploded that morning was not soon forgotten by San Francisco.

The blast which followed the bomber's departure from the church was heard throughout the city. Its effects in the North Beach were devastating. Three attendants asleep within the church were tossed rudely from their beds. Six priests quartered in the adjoining rectory joined them on the floor. The marble vestibule crumbled and the huge doors were ripped from their hinges and crashed to the floor.

Chaos reigned on the North Beach. In addition to the priests scores of persons living near the church were thrown from their beds. Hundreds of windows were shattered. The cry of "Earthquake" was heard as the nightshirted residents poured out into the open.

The damage to the church was tremendous. Stained glass windows burst from their sashes and crashed to the pavement. Father Trinchieri and his priests moved through a dust storm of powdered plaster toward the center of the explosion. Police from all over the city hurried to the North Beach to restore order. And when Louis DeMattei arrived on the scene not a shred of evidence remained. The explosion had destroyed all traces of the bomb.

Fortunately no one was seriously injured by the blast. Captain Matheson was convinced that a fourth bombing would be almost sure to be fatal to someone, however. Each bomb had been more powerful than the last. He believed a fourth attempt to destroy the church might send the entire building crumbling to the pavement. He called Detective DeMattei into his office and asked for a report on the investigation.

DeMattei explained that every possible angle had been explored. He declared that the Mafia and Camorra societies, then at the peak of their power, had been investigated to the best of his abilities and found innocent.

"The Mafia works for a profit," he explained. "There is no profit in destroying a church."

"How do you suggest we prevent this from happening again?" Matheson inquired.

"We set a trap," DeMattei replied promptly. "It's the only answer."

With the help of Father Trinchieri and Corporal Larry McNerny, a little Irish policeman who knew the beach almost as well as DeMattei, who had been raised there, the detective laid his snare.

Father Trinchieri took DeMattei through the church, pointing out the damaged areas and suggesting possible hiding places for policemen. The detective was amazed by the priest's fortitude. For years he knew the Salesian Father had combatted the activities of the Mafia and Camorra fearlessly and tirelessly. Now, faced with a new enemy, he worked long hours with the policeman while at the same time pacifying and soothing his terror stricken flock of parishioners.

DeMattei's task was no simple one. The park in Columbus Square made the problem of laying an effective ambush doubly tough. Without buildings to hide his men in across the street he was forced to improvise a method of watching the street from adjoining buildings without having the watcher seen.

To do this he placed a mirror on a door leading to a front balcony in a manner that anyone approaching from the east could be observed. It took many hours to place the window in such a way that the reflection from the street lights would not show and make it visible to the street.

The building on the east side of the church was an apartment house with front windows which projected several feet over the sidewalk. DeMattei was given permission by the persons renting the apartment to use the rooms containing the windows for observation to the west.

Next the detective called in a city electrician who installed an elaborate system of wiring which covered every vantage point in the building with signals. Bell signals were installed in the apartment house and the whole setup was connected to the rectory by an intercommunication system.

The toughest problem facing DeMattei was how to arrange the entry. The vestibule, twenty feet square, led directly from the broad steps in front of the church to the massive doors. The doors, being solid, were useless because there was no visibility for guards.

Two stained glass windows which stood about twelve feet up on each side of the portal provided the solution. DeMattei ordered them removed and replaced with carefully colored isinglass. The windows were directly over the confessionals within the church. Heavy planks were placed across the tops of the booths and two watchers, armed with shotguns, were placed at each window for many nights to come.

Because the lookouts at the fake windows had their visibility limited by the vestibule it was necessary to arrange a system which would make it possible to notify the officers of the approach of any suspicious characters. A muffled telephone was placed by each window.

Another man, equipped with telephone and buzzer signals, was stationed at a rear portal where he could watch an alley at the back of the building. As an added precaution DeMattei rented an apartment which faced on the alley.

Absolute secrecy was maintained while the trap was prepared. The officers often interrupted their work for hours while a religious ceremony was held in the church. Meanwhile, a squad of picked detectives combed the area in search of the bomber. Suspect after suspect was hauled to the Hall of Justice, grilled and released. A uniformed officer was stationed in front of the church at all times for the purpose of frightening off the bomber in case he attempted to act before the net was thoroughly woven. Then the day came when the newspapers announced that the police guard had been withdrawn from St. Peter and Paul's Church. Chief of Police Daniel O'Brien announced that the department had decided no further bombings would take place.

In spite of all precautions a fourth attempt was made to bomb the church before the trap was complete. At 5:30 on the morning of January 9th an automobile came down the street and paused long enough for a man to descend, throw a bomb against the wall, dart back into the car, and speed away. Officer Edward Moran, who was guarding the church at the time, emptied his gun at the fleeing car but was unable to hit it or secure the license number. Shortly after that the trap was ready.

Night after night the picked squad traveled to the church. Every device was used to avoid tipping the bomber off to the ambush. The detectives arrived carrying laundry and food baskets. Some were dressed as women and others as workmen. The most elaborate stakeout in the history of San Francisco was in operation.

Two months passed and nothing happened. DeMattei and Matheson wondered if the bomber had actually given up. Then, on the morning of March 5th, the two strangers met in front of the church and one laid his lethal package on the doorstep. He lit the fuse and turned to run when McInerny challenged him. The final dramatic chapter was about to be enacted.

Detective DeMattei, sitting at his vantage point by the apartment window, had been uneasy that night. For two hours he had watched a drunk stagger around Columbus Square. The detective wondered whether he was actually drunk or just casing the church. Finally he left abruptly, but DeMattei could not get him off his mind. His hunch was right. The officer recognized the drunk immediately when he returned with his package.

The bomber's drawn gun and the burning fuse did not give Corporal McInerny any choice. He fired immediately and the bomber turned, staggering toward the street. The throaty roar of a sawed-off shotgun in the hands of Patrolman D. A. Kauffman ended the argument. The bomber died instantly, but the fuse burned on. Only a few seconds separated McInerny and his companions from being blown to eternity. They watched, helpless and horrified, while the sputtering snake grew shorter.

One of the massive doors swung open. Patrolman J. C. Gremminger dashed into the vestibule, knife drawn. For a moment he hesitated, getting his bearings. Then he spotted the now short fuse and moved toward it. The sizzling serpent was inches long when he severed it. The danger was over, but not the shooting.

At the sound of the first shot DeMattei, shotgun in hand, had sprinted into the street. He arrived in time to see the second man running toward the park shrubbery. The detective ordered him to halt. The man ran faster.

"Stop!" DeMattei shouted a second time. "This is the police."

The man ran on. DeMattei fired when he saw the fugitive reach into his breast pocket. The buckshot caught him in the hip and he fell, shouting, "God save me. I have the Bible!" He was telling the truth. DeMattei found the Bible in his breast pocket.

The bombings ended that morning of March 5, 1927, but the mystery has lived with San Francisco ever since. Although descriptions of the dead man were sent all over the United States and the affair received nationwide publicity, the bomber was never identified. The second man flatly refused to talk. He declared that he was innocent and knew nothing of the bomber or bombings. Several months after the shooting he died in the San Francisco hospital as the result of an operation on his injured hip. If he knew the bomber's name he took it with him in death.

The last bomb had been big enough to destroy the church entirely. It consisted of twenty-six sticks of dynamite, each one wrapped in moulder's clay to add force to the explosion. The fuse was attached to a fulminate of mercury cap on the center stick. Experts declared it would have leveled the church and killed many people in the immediate neighborhood.

A thousand dollar reward offered by Father Trinchieri for the capture of the bomber was refused by the officers and returned to the Salesian Fathers to be used for charity. And today, more than a quarter of a century after the persistent attempt to destroy the building, St. Peter and Paul's Church stands across from Columbus Square, still the dominant structure on the North Beach skyline.

PIONEERS OF SCIENCE

(Conclusion)

By B. C. BRIDGES

The oldest recorded identification bureau in Switzerland is located at Geneva, although others were set up subsequently at Aarau, Basel, Lucerne, Zurich and Berne, which latter place was finally selected as the National Registry. Anthropometry was used as early as 1891, but, in 1902, fingerprinting was introduced at Geneva, where the only impressions at first taken were those of the right thumb, index, middle and ring fingers, and the thumb and index digits of the left hand. The procedure was patterned after the Paris methods. Nevertheless, this was later superseded by the recording of all ten fingers, which were then classified and filed according to pattern designs.

Anthropometry was instituted in Spain by royal decree on September 10, 1896, and measuring equipment was placed in seven of the principal prisons under supervision of Dr. H. Simancas. A few years' trial of this system disclosed it to be untrustworthy; accumulative error rendered the files practically useless, and three of the original bureaus ceased to function. Official recognition of these inefficient conditions resulted in orders for reorganization, which were issued February 28, 1901, and F. Oloriz Aquilera, professor of anatomy at Madrid, was appointed as supervisor. Registration by fingerprints was sponsored by this authority, who compiled yet another classifying and filing technique which he named the "Oloriz System," but this he later discarded in favor of the more inclusive employment of the Vucetich method.

Along with his other contributions to fingerprint innovations, Oloriz Aquilera taught his subordinates to classify the digital patterns by direct examination of the subject's hands, rather than by reading the same prints on a registration card. This was a recognition of the methods employed by the primeval savage, who knew his "public enemies" through their earth-recorded skin designs. It is indeed comforting to recognize that this involved inconsistency, arbitrarily termed "civilization," occasionally nourishes a mentality with enough perception to appreciate such sterling utilities.

In 1910, the capable Aquilera prepared for his officers a manual on criminal identification in which were furnished detailed descriptions of many known offenders, together with the code formulas for their fingerprints. Thus, twentieth-century Madrid police officers were equipped with information enabling them to approximate the accomplishments of the cave man.

For some years, the civil police department of Constantinople maintained an identification bureau copied after the French; but here too the tide of popular opinion swept anthropometry into the discard, and a fingerprint bureau, pattern after the German technique, became a central office for the entire Ottoman Empire. As explained, the German classification and filing procedure utilized the Galton-Henry advocacy, modified by Windt and Kodicek.

B. C. BRIDGES

At this time, fingerprint registration, with few exceptions, was decentralized in European territory. However, Budapest, the first continental city to utilize the unmodified Galton-Henry system, achieved an interchange program of registration that was both novel and effective. On October 15, 1908, an order of the Minister of Justice created the "Royal Central Registry Office of Hungary," which came into actual existence a few months later. Thereafter, active exchange of data was practised between representative cities, and criminal court procedure required that fingerprints be furnished with records of the defendants sent to the criminal registry. In connection with the central office, there was also maintained a complete technical laboratory to deal with such evidential impressions as might be found at a crime locale; this valuable service was available to the whole country.

Modern fingerprint methods were employed in Egypt, during the year 1902, and descendants of the mighty pharaohs again used a facility which had well served their ancient progenitors. It is interesting to observe that the latter-day practice included civil registration of industrial as well as municipal employees. A similar enactment of non-criminal fingerprint law was made in the Transvaal on January 1, 1908, where widely-inclusive civilian fingerprinting was made legally imperative.

As already indicated in connection with the famous South American criminologist, Juan Vucetich, fingerprinting was well established in the Argentine at an early date, this being one of the first countries to employ it. Succeeding development and expansion included the extensive registration of civic retainers and others engaged in public service, as well as of domestics. Descriptive information for passports also included fingerprints. Through Vucetich's example in the Argentine, other South American states followed with the installation of similar programs, and, on October 20, 1905, an agreement was formed among Argentine, Chili, Uruguay and Brazil, whereby all of these were included in the scope of fingerprint registration, and provision was made for an exchange of photographs and records of outstanding offenders, and unidentified casualties.

Personal identification, of a sort, came into being in Mexico, with a bureau of anthropometry was set up at the Belem Prison on September 1, 1895, by Dr. Ignacio Ocampo, the movement having been furthered some years previously by Fernandez Ortigosa. But, like all other trials of body-measurement systems, this also finally was discarded, and it is a significant circumstance that within recent years, national registration has made mandatory the fingerprinting of every man, woman and child within the boundaries of Mexican territory.

In French Indo-China, fingerprinting was selected to replace anthropometry, which had been adopted in 1879 and employed at Saigon. Another original technique in fingerprint classification was compiled here by M. Pottecher, although the advocacy enjoyed no great popularity elsewhere. In the Straits Settlements and the Malay States of Penang and Singapore, fingerprinting attained high success; record-exchange data were received from the United Malay States, from Malacca, and from Johore. In the adjacent Philippines, fingerprints came into commercial recognition and usage, even in banking.

In Australia, as might be expected, the Galton-Henry application attained popularity coincidental with its rise in other British possessions; Sydney was selected as the Continental Bureau, and an active exchange of records continued with Perth, Brisbane, Adelaide, Melbourne and other important centers.

RESEARCH GRANT

The Traffic Institute of Northwestern University has received a $10,000 grant from the Allstate Insurance Company to conduct research and development work in the street and highway traffic field, according to Franklin M. Kreml, Institute director.

This is the second year the funds have been granted. Last year $5,000 was allocated to the Traffic Institute by Allstate.

In connection with the granting of the funds, Calvin Fentress, Jr., president of Allstate said:

"This year our company has substantially enlarged the grant made to the Traffic Institute because of our high regard for the Traffic Institute's program.

"We are pleased to make this contribution to the splendid work that is being done to help public officials meet their responsibilities in traffic supervision and accident prevention."

The Allstate funds, Mr. Kreml said, will be used to further that phase of the Institute's program directed by James Stannard Baker, director of research and development.

Institute activities cover a broad program of traffic training, field and extension service, publications, research and development.

Principal financial supporters of the Institute, which was established in 1936, are the Automotive Safety Foundation, the Kemper Foundation for Traffic Safety, the Association of Casualty and Surety Companies, the National Association of Automotive Mutual Insurance Companies, and the Liberty Mutual Insurance Company. Contract work is done for the U. S. Bureau of Public Roads, the American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators, the U. S. Army, and the U. S. Air Force.

WATER HEATERS

Don't get into hot water over your automobile's heater. Proper installation of an automobile hot water heater is essential if maximum efficiency is to be obtained, the California State Automobile Association advises. This type of heater should be installed so that the water in the heater will be at least two inches below the water level of the car radiator, and lower if possible.

WORSHIP OF KATCHINAS

The Pueblo of Zuni, located in western New Mexico, is reported by the National Automobile Club to have a form of worship centered on many gods that are called Katchinas.

INSPECTORS' BUREAU

Beyond the city limits of San Jose lie the duties and problems of the Santa Clara County Sheriff's Department. Behind the routine duties of the deputy sheriff's lies the nucleus of the entire department—the Bureau of Inspectors. This bureau handles everything from homicide to exposition of bunco games, through the use of specialist teams.

The specialist team is composed of two men highly trained in one particular field of investigation. These teams are put into action the moment an act is reported. The initial investigation is generally handled by the uniform patrol and then the specialist teams are dispatched by the captain of the Bureau of Inspectors.

Santa Clara County Sheriff's Bureau of Inspectors has four outstanding Specialist teams. Due to the greater frequency of burglary and petty thefts two teams, well trained in this field, are necessary. Homicide, armed robbery and assault with a deadly weapon are handled by another team and forgeries, grand-theft, sex and bunco rackets are handled by still a different team.

The inspectors bureau now has a personnel of twenty-eight, this is quite an increase over the four investigators used a few years back. Expansion in the department has been constant with the increased housing and families coming into the area. The department's teletype letters are now received on a twenty-four hour basis. (This is a state wide service.) Also, there has been an addition of a Juvenile Department to increase the bureau's efficiency in handling any type of case. Working directly under the Captain of the Inspector's Bureau are two inspectors and a police woman, all well trained in handling juvenile problems.

One man who has watched the continual growth of the Bureau is the captain of the inspectors, James Cunningham. Captain Cunningham was born in the Evergreen District of San Jose November 7, 1902. His school education was not fancy—he was unable to attend college because of a necessity to work. He entered the San Jose Police Department in 1924 and absorbed sound education in police procedure and techniques during his ten years in the city department. He then spent two years in business and again returned to police work. However, this time he entered the sheriff's department where he has remained for over fifteen years.

Upon entering the Sheriff's Department James was introduced to the operation of the teletype machine and for six years he held this duty. He continued to study and absorb during this period and was later promoted to a senior deputy in investigation, then to inspector and finally to his present position as Captain of the entire Inspector's Bureau.

Captain Cunningham is a friendly well spoken man and well educated in his specialized field of investigation. In his twenty-five years of police work I felt that Captain Cunningham must have had some very unusual experiences.

When talking with the Captain I asked if he could relate any outstanding personal experience but I found him to be a modest man relating only experiences of the men in his department.

Later when talking to one of the inspectors, I was told of the time that Captain Cunningham arrested a bank robber less than fourteen minutes following the actual robbery. The bank was the Beverly Burbank Branch of the First National which had been held up by John Franz. As the inspector explained, Cunningham had a description of the bank robber and his car. As he was driving North he recognized the robbery suspect speeding in the opposite direction. He immediately made a "U" turn, caught the car and apprehended Franz.

Such an arrest would require an ever alert eye and constant presence of mind. I am confident that this particular incident, great or small, in a large measure shows the caliber of men we have directing our local police departments. Men like Sheriff Hornbuckle, Chief Blackmore and Captain Cunningham make our cities and counties ever increasingly safe.

LICENSE SUSPENSION

California residents involved in serious violations of motor vehicle laws in another state may have their driver's license suspended or revoked in this state under the provision of a new law, the California State Automobile Association warns.

At the discretion of the Department of Motor Vehicles, the driver's license of a resident of California may be suspended or revoked if that person is guilty of certain offenses in another state which, had they been convicted of the same offenses in this state, would have resulted in the loss of the license here.

The CSAA further points out that another new law requires suspension of the driving privileges of any resident of California upon receipt of a report by the Motor Vehicle Department that his or her driving privileges has been suspended in another state for failure to meet the financial security provisions of that state, if such failure would compel suspension here.

The world's first lie detector can be seen at Washington State college.

It is an odd combination of bolts and belts that the inventor, John Larson, first used in solving a series of thefts in a girls' dormitory back in the year 1921. Detectives had been stumped by the robberies in this dormitory on the University of California campus. Larson, a pre-med student, with police permission, administered the test to the girls living in the dormitory, and, within an hour, with the machine's aid, had found the thief.

Thus, from Larson's polygraph, was born the world's first lie detector. Larson, a friend of Dr. V. A. Leonard's, loaned the contraption to the present chairman of the department of police science and administration.

At the time Dr. Leonard first knew of the machine he was on the Berkeley California, police force, which he joined in the early twenties. During those years he saw lie detecting machines in acting in a number of the two thousand criminal cases in which it served.

"This machine helped to give the Berkeley police force its reputation as one of the finest in the nation" says Dr. Leonard, adding: "The polygraph, known popularly as the lie detector, soon became a necessary part of police equipment."

Improvements and stepped up production of lie detectors put the original machine out of use in 1930, and it was placed in storage. There it remained until 1944 when Dr. Leonard had it sent to WSC, thinking of its double-value as a collector's item and to aid in student study.

Now, the machine is enclosed in a 6 foot by 2½ foot glass case and looks greatly unlike the modern lie detector. It is equipped with two recording needles, which are in turn joined by a sensitive transmission device so that their writings are scratched on a six-inch strip of paper, coated with lamp-black. Hooked up to the cardiac and pulmonary systems these needles record any change in rate of pulse and respiration.

Dr. Leonard says: "Invention and ultimate success of the lie detector has not only proven many guilty of crimes, but in addition it has freed innocent men who might have been convicted. It has cut the cost of police protection and saved hours of investigation. It is but one of many instruments the modern law enforcement agency uses."

Dr. Leonard invites all who are interested to see this machine in its quarters in his office in Morrill hall.

JUDGE AND JURY

Editor's Note: We will have to confess. Not too long ago we were employed for the purpose of writing a lot of California history. A week or so ago we were glancing through our notes and decided that the problems of law enforcement officers in those days would rival those in the field today. For instance there was the case of California's first lynching. This happened in Sacramento early in 1850. It did actually happen. We cannot vouch for the conversation. We just did our best to reconstruct it. But the incident is true. What would you do with this judge and jury?

Spring came and expanded streams, made fat by the thaw of Sierra snows, swallowed rich bars and sent the miners, idle and irritable, into the streets of Sacramento where the sweaty palm of tension prodded their restless souls.

The saloon they called The Shades was a mud-caked tent where argonauts stood on the hard packed earth and rested their elbows on an unfinished plank which served well enough as a bar.

From his post behind the plank, Mark Stewart watched his customers warily. The bar was lined from end to end with the rugged blend of raw humanity which had drifted west with the talk of gold and founded the city by Sutter's Fort. Quiet men now. No shouting or laughing or talk of home. They ordered their drinks in low pitched grunts and downed them with the thirsty gulps of those who had seen and done too much too fast. Strange, somber men whose eyes never lifted from the whiskey ringlets their glasses made on the board, each one pretending the neighbor whose shoulder he rubbed was in another plane or another world.

One bottle was dry and another near empty. The men drank steadily, still avoiding each other's gaze with eyes which reflected an odd mixture of shame and defiance. Stewart waited nervously for someone to talk. One word would break the tension.

The right word. But it could not come from him. They could not know he had been there. They would resent the fact that he had rushed pell mell from the fringe of the crowd back to his makeshift tavern in time to take advantage of the rush of business he knew was sure to come.

Still, the silence was getting the best of him. A weird silence with a discordant rumble in the background, drifting toward the river from the east. A rumble which had been a roar a few minutes ago when the crowd had been a mob these men had led. He could picture them lingering now, standing curiously by the trunk of the tall oak tree on K Street where the body hung, still twitching.

Stewart could not stand it. He had to talk.

"Nice day," he observed.

Joe Stephens, the tall young man in the center of the bar drained his tumbler in one quick gulp and wiped the glistening drops from his beard and moustache.

"Nice day for a hanging," he replied.

Flecks of grey speckled the beard of the man next to him. He tilted the bottle and drained its contents into the two glasses. Then he lifted his own and stared soberly at his companion.

"You should know, Joe," he declared. It was your rope."

The young man's color deepened. "That's not funny, Bartlett. This is a bad day for a man to be funny on."

"I didn't mean it funny. I'm glad you had the rope."

"You sure look like you're glad."

"Take it easy, boys," Stewart admonished. "You've had enough excitement for one day."

Stephens drained his glass and stared at the bar pensively. "I wish I still had the rope."

"I don't, Joe." A dark, clean shaven man wearing a tall beaver hat and bright satin vest addressed him. "The devil had it coming, didn't he?"

"I guess he had it coming," Stephens answered. "I don't know. I didn't see it. All I know is that the blacksmith was my friend."

"I saw it all," the dark man assured him. "He had it coming all right. I was standing at the bar in the Mansion House when the blacksmith poked his head through the door. He never had a chance."

"That's right, Joe," Bartlett chimed in. "The poor fellow didn't even get to the bar. Got it right through the back of the neck."

The dark man shook his head. "Not the back, Bartlett. He didn't get that far. The thing had been building up for quite a while. Not with the blacksmith, but with the gambler. You see, he was new in town and I guess he figured on making a quick killing."

The dark man paused and riffled a stack of gold coins through his fingers significantly. "I don't suppose he knew there were some pretty good poker players here back in the days when John Sutter was the big cheese out at the Fort and we thought all the gold in the country was running around on the backs of beaver and otter."

"I still don't get it, Sam," Bartlett protested. "The blacksmith wasn't playing with him, was he? What started the shooting anyway?"

"No, the blacksmith didn't play with him," Sam replied. "The fellow went crazy, that's all. Just clean, plumb crazy. He came out here to a place where a man pays five dollars for a bed in a penny flophouse and a dollar for a drink of whiskey and he couldn't make it. His pile was too small to begin with. And his table didn't make a dime all the time he was in the Mansion House. When the blacksmith poked his head through the door he was broke. Dead, flat broke. He was so mad he felt like shooting someone, so he just shot the first man that talked to him."

"Well, that's murder, isn't it?" someone inquired.

"Sure, it's murder," the dark man told him. "It's just like I said. The devil had it coming to him. In fact, maybe hanging was too good for him."

"Where did the blacksmith get it?" Stephens inquired.

"In the chest. As close as I could tell right through the heart," Sam declared.

"I heard there was a girl mixed up in it," someone said.

"That little dancing girl over at the Stinking Tent. One of the fair but frail."

Once again Sam shook his head. "No, it wasn't the girl. The gambler wasn't in town long enough to get to know a girl."

"Then the blacksmith must have said something."

Sam grinned wryly. "He said something all right."

Stephens poured himself a brimming glassful, downed it, then turned to the dark man. "What did he say?"

"He asked him what time it was."

"That was all?"

"That was all."

There was a long pause while Stephens filled his glass again and held it to the light. He drained it with a series of shorter sips. When he spoke his voice was noticeably thicker.

"We should have hung the sheriff too," he muttered. "He tried to save the gambler."

"Now take it easy, Joe," Bartlett admonished. "The sheriff is all right. He was just trying to do his job."

"His job isn't to protect murderers, is it?" Stephens demanded.

"No," Sam interjected. "But he is supposed to protect one until he gets a fair trial. Then he can have the pleasure of hanging him all by himself."

"He had a trial, didn't he?" Stephens inquired. "You were the judge and we were the jury."

"Not quite fair, I suppose," the dark man admitted. "After all, we weren't what you would exactly call an officially designated body. But is was fair enough, I guess. The crowd elected us. And everybody in Sacramento was there."

"It was fair enough," Bartlett agreed. "What I don't understand is Judge Warren's attitude. He sure pulled a quick about face. One minute he got the whole thing organized. Then that little ball headed coot from Doc Gainsley's office came running over to him and he turned right around and tried to talk us out of it."

Stephens grinned drunkenly. "A lot of good it did him. By then everybody was yelling so loud nobody heard what he had to say."

There was another pause, but one of a different nature from the one which had existed earlier. Mark Stewart breathed a sigh of relief. The tension had eased. Everything would be all right. And business was good. The men at the bar had settled down to some steady drinking. Hardly anyone noticed when the broad shouldered man in the frock coat and soft black hat walked through the entrance. The tavern owner greeted him.

"Good afternoon, Doc," he said pleasantly. "We don't see you very often."

Doc Gainsley gazed at him steadily. "Not often," he agreed.

"What will it be?"

"The only thing you've got. Whisky."

Stephens stared at the newcomer through half closed eyes. "What's the matter, Doc? Something eating you?"

Gainsley shook his head. "Nothing important."

"It's all right, Doc," Bartlett informed the doctor. "We all know they called you when the blacksmith got it. No one blames you."

"That's fine," the doctor said. "That's just fine."

"Take it easy, Doc," the dark man advised. "You couldn't do anything. The blacksmith was dead before he hit the floor."

Doc Gainsley eyed him coldly. "Not quite," he declared.

Stephens braced himself against the plank and turned toward the doctor. "What do you mean 'not quite', Doc? Either a man dies or he doesn't. The blacksmith is dead, isn't he?"

"He's dead all right."

"Then what are you worrying about?"

The doctor grimaced, downed his drink, then stepped away from the crowd at the bar. He cleared his throat and the self styled judge and jury turned to look at him.

"It may please you gentlemen to know that the blacksmith died in my office," he said. He paused a moment, waiting to be sure that his next remark would sink in. "He died about five minutes ago. The cause of death, as close as I can tell, was a cardiac obstruction. Heart failure to you. The bullet barely nicked him."

Doc Gainsley pulled aside the tent flap and stepped out into the clean spring sunlight. Back in the tavern Mark Stewart watched his customers warily. They were quiet again. Too quiet. They ordered their drinks in low pitched grunts and downed them with the thirsty gulps of those who have seen and done too much too fast.

ONE IN NINE

During 1953 one of every nine motor vehicle drivers in the state was cited by a member of the California Highway Patrol for failure to observe traffic regulations.

"A ghastly by-product of this disregard for traffic laws was 3376 persons dead and upward of 110,000 injured," said Patrol Commissioner B. R. Caldwell today following a review of provisional reports on the 1953 traffic toll.

There were 3562 fatalities during 1952.

"Seven per cent of all drivers, or almost one-half million, were observed committing dangerous acts while their vehicles were in motion. These are the violations that most often result in death or injury," Caldwell emphasized.

The State's 6,017,000 licensed drivers received 524,383 citations and 165,560 warnings from members of the Patrol last year for traffic law infractions. Of the citations issued, 460,717 were for hazardous accident causing violations. These figures represent increases over the 439,324 total citations and 368,701 moving violation arrests made during 1952. Warnings dropped from 241,797 to 165,560.

"The primary concern of the Highway Patrol is the protection of all users of the highways. At the same time, the primary objective of every motorist should be to drive within the laws," Caldwell declared.

DON'T DANGLE ARM

Don't dangle your arm out the window while driving, advises the National Automobile Club. Such false arm signals only cause confusion on the highway, and confusion on the highway usually ends in collision.

ONE CAR ENOUGH

"It doesn't take a second car to make a fatal crash."

Authority for this statement comes from provisional statistics released by the California Highway Patrol which indicate that more than one-fourth of all fatal accidents during 1953 were non-collision accidents. Of 2896 fatal accidents, 766 or 26.4 per cent, involved only one car.

"Most common types of non-collision accidents are those that occur when a car goes out of control and overturns on a roadway or runs off the roadway," commented B. R. Caldwell, Patrol Commissioner.

"Many factors figure in these non-collision accidents but errors of driving judgment are responsible in the vast majority of cases.

"Common errors," he said, "include traveling too fast for conditions, especially on strange roads; permitting distractions or obstructions to interfere when driving; continuing to drive when overtired or sleepy; overdriving headlights; and operating cars that are in unsafe mechanical condition.

"The driver himself can control these conditions in the vast majority of cases," he cautioned.

Other types of non-collision accidents which contributed to last year's non-collision toll included occupants falling from moving vehicles, mechanical failures and fires, and accidents caused by wheels or other parts coming off the vehicle.

OWNER ACCOUNTABLE

The registered owner of an unoccupied motor vehicle which breaks away or slips its brakes and goes careening destructively down a hill has to answer to a new law incorporated in the California Vehicle Code.

The owner of a driverless runaway motor vehicle, whether it is parked by him or someone else with his knowledge and consent, is considered to be the driver and must comply with the requirements of the financial security law and, if necessary, post security, reports the California State Automobile Association. Thus a rectification has been effected in the law which, through a former inequity, required only the owner of the vehicle struck by a runaway machine to file a report and, if there were injuries or damages, to post security.

Give Young Hoodlum Gangs the "Harass and Haunt" Treatment

A recent news item from Philadelphia recounts a startling method adopted by the police of that city for the handling of young hoodlum gangs. It reads as follows: "Philadelphia police, deluged with complaints of rowdiness by youthful mobs in recent weeks, drove ahead with a crackdown on teenage gangs today after rounding up more than 1,000 youngsters over the week-end. Captain Howard R. Leary of the Juvenile Aid Bureau and Police Commissioner Thomas J. Gibbons said: 'The police will harass and haunt these gangs until they make up their minds to settle down, be good citizens and stop bothering others.'"

CHANGE OIL THOROUGHLY

If you are one of those motorists who buy crankcase oil in bulk, and quite a number do, according to the National Automobile Club, don't allow haste spoil the effect of changing the engine lubricant. It is easy to do, accomplished most frequently by not allowing the old oil thoroughly to drain off. The last drop, it should be borne in mind, always is the dirtiest.

Don't drive after drinking, advises the National Automobile Club.

ANTI-FREEZE

If you're going to add a permanent-type anti-freeze to your car's cooling system it may not be very permanent unless you first check all water connections for leaks, replace defective hoses and tighten hose clamps. It's also a good idea, suggests the California State Automobile Association, to check the thermostat and flush the entire cooling system with clean water before adding the anti-freeze.

The Traffic Accident Investigator's Manual, a 285-page, 15 chapter textbook, has just been published by the Traffic Institute, Northwestern University.

The new publication covers the basic problems confronted by the traffic accident investigator at the operational level. It contains more than 100 photographs, charts, tables, and diagrams.

Chapter titles are:

Traffic Accidents and Their Causes, Traffic Accident Investigation—What It Is and Why It Is Important, Legal Responsibilities in Connection with Traffic Accidents, Planning the Accident Investigation, Questioning Drivers and Witnesses, Road and Weather Conditions, Clues Useful in Accident Investigation, Skidmarks, Measurements and Diagrams in Accident Investigation, Skidmarks Measurements and Records, Photography in Accident Investigation, The Accident Report Form, Speed Estimates, Hit-and-Run Investigation, and Civil Liability Aspects of Police Accident Investigation.

"It has not been possible to cover all operational phases of traffic accident investigation in this volume," L. J. McEnnis, Jr., Institute director of publications, said. "Had publication been delayed until all topics were developed, the materials presented might not have been available under one cover for several years. It is anticipated, however, that these materials will eventually become part of a larger complete volume to be published by the Traffic Institute."

The new book is paper bound. The price is $3.50. It may be ordered from the Traffic Institute, Northwestern University, 1704 Judson Ave., Evanston, Ill.

Months later, following surgery, she was finally informed that she would never walk again.

"I hope people will realize, when they start to take unnecessary chances, that an accident doesn't always end when the glass is swept off the street. A fraction of a second can change an entire lifetime," she commented.

SAFETY

The first twenty-five miles away from home are the most hazardous when you're driving an automobile, says the California State Automobile Association. Statistics show that sixty-one per cent of the drivers involved in the 33,000 fatal accidents during 1952 lived within twenty-five miles of where the accident occurred, in short, safety should begin at home.

STOPPING POWER

The chances of your brakes failing when you step on the brake pedal are not very great but that doesn't mean you should neglect them. The complete braking system of an automobile should be checked over carefully at regular intervals, advises the California State Automobile Association. Having this done once a year or every 15,000 miles is a wise rule to follow.

COMMUNITY PRIDE

Clear highways and streets reflect community pride and alertness, states the California State Automobile Association. Motorists should help keep streets and highways uncluttered by not tossing trash out of car windows.

LIVESTOCK

If you meet or overtake any animal or livestock, you must reduce the speed of your vehicle or stop as may be necessary or may be requested by any person in charge of the animal or livestock, the California State Automobile Association says.

DRIVING IN FOG

Use your lower headlight beams when driving in a fog, and reduce your speed, says the California State Automobile Association in reminding motorists of the law. Fighting with your high beams in a fog is like shining your lights on a mirror — the light is reflected back into your own eyes.

WHITE AT NIGHT

A large metropolitan police department made a check of the clothing worn by pedestrians killed in traffic at night. About four-fifths of the victims were wearing dark clothes and one-fifth light-colored garments. This study points up the rule stressed by the California State Automobile Association that pedestrians are less likely to encounter traffic mishaps at night if they wear or carry something white after dark so that drivers can see them more easily.

HELP YOUNGSTERS

Sometimes persons who drive children to and from classes double-park at the school, thus requiring the youngsters to step between parked vehicles. Children are constantly taught at school not to step between vehicles parked at a curb, a rule that is vital to their safety, so don't encourage the youngsters to violate it, urges the California State Automobile Association.

TRAFFIC SIGNS

Signs, signals and markings are visible symbols of traffic laws and safety rules. It is always to the driver's advantage to heed and obey them, advises the California State Automobile Association. Here in California nine out of every ten fatal and injury accidents involve at least one traffic law violation. Break a traffic law and you'll probably have an accident.

BAD WEATHER

Accidents increase at night and in bad weather. Most of these mishaps can be avoided if drivers adjust driving habits to the hazardous conditions facing them, says the California State Automobile Association. It's also important to keep a car's safety equipment—tires, brakes, lights, horn, windshield wipers, steering gear—in good working order.

CLEAN MOTOR

Keep your car's motor clean, advises the California State Automobile Association. An accumulation of oil and grease on the engine and ignition system not only creates a fire hazard but it may cause hard starting.

SNOW COUNTRY TRIP

If you plan a week-end trip to the snow country check your car battery to see that it is fully charged, advises the California State Automobile Association. A battery that is not fully charged may function in temperate weather, but often it will not start your car in below-freezing temperatures.

BELATED CURES

Those who disregard health rules contract serious ailments and suddenly become desperately aware of the need for a cure. Drivers who disregard safety rules sooner or later become involved in serious accidents and then suddenly become desperately aware of the necessity of traffic safety rules and practices. The California State Automobile Association urges drivers to remember that an ounce of accident prevention is worth a pound of safety cure.

A DEADLY FORCE

Centrifugal force isn't a living thing, but it can quickly become a deadly thing when a driver takes a curve too fast. Watch your speed when rounding curves, warns the California State Automobile Association. A car out of control at a bend may mean your life's at an end.

CLEAN WINDSHIELDS

Clean windshields cut light glare, reports the National Automobile Club.

The magic whispers...

When Grandpa tucked you between his knees, you knew you were going to listen again to his wonderful watch—to hear its magic tick . . . tick . . . tick . . .

And as you listened, those measured whispers of time shut away the world, leaving you close to Grandpa, secure in his love.

From fathers and mothers to sons and daughters passes the lifeblood of happiness—security. The privilege of providing it for those we love can be found only in a land like ours.

And another wonderful thing is this: By realizing this privilege of freedom for ourselves, we achieve the security of our country. For, think—the strength of America is simply the strength of one secure home touching that of another.

Saving for security is easy! Read every word—now! If you've tried to save and failed, chances are it was because you didn't have a plan. Well, here's a savings system that really works—the Payroll Savings Plan for investing in Savings Bonds.

This is all you do. Go to your company's pay office, choose the amount you want to save—a couple of dollars a payday, or as much as you wish. That money will be set aside for you before you even draw your pay. And automatically invested in Series E U. S.
Savings Bonds which are turned over to you.

If you can save only $3.75 a week on the Plan, in 9 years and 8 months you will have $2,137.30. If you can save as much as $18.75 a week, 9 years and 8 months will bring you $10,700!

For your sake, and your family's, too, how about

COMPETITION

Why gasoline is a real bargain today

Two facts lie behind the low price you pay for gasoline: oil companies work constantly through research to improve products and keep prices low, and they compete intensely for your patronage. That's why Standard opened the West's first petroleum research laboratory 32 years ago—and invests about $6 million annually in research.

One result you see here. Thanks to competition, gasoline prices (aside from taxes) have risen only 20% since 1925 . . . less than half as much as practically anything else you buy. But there have been other benefits for you, too. Research, motivated by competition, has resulted in a steadily improving gasoline. Two gallons of modern gasoline do the work that required 3 in 1925, and this has paved the way for lighter, more efficient car engines that give you more power, performance and economy. Competition and research have led to better gas station service, as well, and to the world-wide search that has discovered the largest known oil reserves in America's history. Last year, Standard Oil Company of California invested $225 million in exploration, new oil wells, improved facilities to keep pace with competition. The result is better gasoline at prices which make it one of the real bargains in your family budget.

75 years of planning ahead to serve you better

"ARE YOU GUILTY?"

Reviewed by B. C. BRIDGES

This question, "Are you guilty?", represents the startling title of the most recent book by William Dienstin, Professor of Criminology in the Fresno State College at Fresno, California. It is published by Charles C. Thomas, 301-327 East Lawrence Avenue, Springfield, Illinois. The work also offers the added distinction of an illuminating foreword by August Vollmer, World-recognized leader in the law-enforcement field, and justly famed as "the father of modern police science." His stamp of approval on any text in this domain is ample proof of its merit.

With ARE YOU GUILTY? Professor Dienstin has presented a fearless expose certain to shock the most blase reader into vivid awareness of reality. In view of his wide experience and background, this writer is well suited to cover his subject, competently. In his preface, he asserts: "The purpose of this book is to present to the public an overall picture of the program of the administration of criminal justice in the United States of America. Neither is it a legalistic interpretation. Rather, it is an attempt at objectivity such as an observer who seeks information would like to obtain. — The writer is not a reformer, nor a crusader, nor a muckraker. The text is presented to allow the reader to take a look at those factors which have made the administration of justice the subject of contempt, abuse, disrespect, and even hatred.—The machinery of criminal justice is an intricate and involved process that loses its meaning when separated into its various parts and examined by segmentation. The sequence of chapters in this book attempts to present in chronological pattern the various parts of the machinery as the offender is a part of or in contact with each part."

In addition to the fact that Professor Dienstin's book personifies stark realism, it is exceptionally well written. All readers familiar with the lucid style identifying all of his earlier writings, must agree that this present work is his best to date.

B. C. BRIDGES

Certain other contributors have assumed to offer unbiased surveys on the shortcomings of American jurisprudence, but, in many cases, they have either dwelt upon a few aspects only, or else skirted the problem, diffidently. Furthermore, all too frequently, popular apathy has tended to ignore or minimize discrepancies in our justice program, thus encouraging dangerous complacency in the public mind. In fact, only occasional writers have displayed the self-reliance needful to take issue here and wage a campaign for betterment.

Professor Dienstin, however, is happily free from such inhibitions, and to all who read his book, it will be plain that he offers a new concept calculated to inspire both corrective thought and action. His material is well documented by case histories and much factual data assembled from many sources; it leaves no valid ground for challenge. Also, he has given his theme ample coverage, as attested by his chapter titles, which include the following: "What is Justice?; The People and the Press; Laws, Legislators, Lobbies and Politicians; The Police; Jails and Bails; Lawyers, Defense Attorneys, and Prosecutors; Judges; Juries; Probation; Prison; Parole." From this resume, it is obvious that Professor Dienstin has considered his subject from many angles.

As to the book's more intimate contents, there is herein an enlightening survey of the entire law-enforcement program in all of its ramifications. The actual events portrayed include instances citing obviously guilty persons who eluded punishment; and also examples of perfectly innocent victims subjected to inhuman persecution; it describes crass afflictions of misfeasance and malfeasance imposed upon the unsuspecting, together with numerous other legal travesties. In short, he outlines the diverse machinations of graft, vice, crime, ignorance and indifference, as affecting the highly-placed law official down to the lowliest civic servant, to say nothing of the general public. Added to this, Professor Dienstin explains not only why these conditions exist, but also offers practical measures for their eradication.

It is a conservative statement to say that Professor Dienstin's technique combines force with clarity. His following re-

RESORT POLICE CHIEF

How would you like to be the chief of police in a city whose population fluctuates between 20 and 150 thousand regularly?

That is the problem that faces Chief of Police Al Huntsman and his Santa Cruz police force.

Santa Cruz, a city with a normal population of 22,000, is a strict resort community. From May to September, and even during the winter months if the weather is nice, crowds of fun seekers jam Highway 17 in an effort to reach the sandy beaches of northern California's favorite resort area.

The entire county is resort minded, and the crowds not only jam-pack the famed beach and boardwalk, but they pour into the nearby recreation areas such as famed Big Basin state park and the quiet, charming San Lorenzo Valley. But Santa Cruz is the center of the annual migration.

Unlike some resort spots, Santa Cruz has a diversified group of vacationists. They come from all walks of life—from farm workers of Central California to the upper crust of San Francisco society. On a beautiful day you are likely to find a group of high school students laying on the beach listening to their portable radio, while nearby will sit a pensioned couple enjoying the warm sun and the weekly band concerts.

It is during the vacation period that the resources of Chief Huntsman and his police force are strained to the breaking point.

But it isn't crime that provides Santa Cruz policemen with their main problem—it is the flow of traffic. Thousands of autos pour from the three highways leading into the community each weekend, and they create a traffic problem that would bring a frown to the officer on duty at Third and Market streets at 5 p.m.

The problem isn't helped by highways that have not been kept up to the times, or city streets that are too narrow. But the 39-man Santa Cruz police department has learned to take the influx in stride, and they handle it with comparative ease. There are still tieups, but the police force keeps them to a minimum.

In Huntsman, the city of Santa Cruz was lucky to find one of the top police administrators in the state. Last July, Huntsman rounded out 20 years of service in the local force. It was in 1933 that Huntsman became chief of the 12 officers who comprised the squad in that day. Today, he heads an organization of 39, including four women on the clerical staff.

When he assumed leadership of the police department, there was one patrol wagon and a touring car, no radio, and next to no record system. Today, the police of Santa Cruz have at their disposal a fleet of modern patrol cars, equipped with the latest radio and electronic devices, and a record section that compares favorably with any in the state.

Huntsman believes in a "clean town", and one of his first acts in taking over the police department was to crack down on the flourishing gambling houses and to rout what there was of prostitution. He let it be known that neither would henceforth be tolerated in the surf city—and he has kept the lid down since.

He would be the first to admit that during the summer months some unsavory "characters" make their appearance. But the alert work of the department makes sure their activities are kept to a minimum.

Chief Huntsman considers the biggest single step forward in the 20 years of development of the modern police department was the purchase and installation of modern radio communications for the dispatch and intercommunication of police vehicles.

He explains that while Santa Cruz is a comparatively small city, population wise, it covers a great many square miles, and without modern police equipment it would be impossible to provide citizens with the proper protection. "With our communication system," Huntsman says, "we are able to rush reinforcements to trouble spots as they develop, whether they be a traffic tieup, or an armed robbery."

A second reason for the rapid growth of the police department, according to Huntsman, was the free hand given him in building up a complete and amply staffed record bureau.

"Both cost money," he says, "but both have paid big dividends in a better and more efficient system of law enforcement."

The police department was also strengthened when the city manager form of government was installed in Santa Cruz following World War II, and with it came the civil service system. Both have proved effective in making the police department more effective.

Huntsman has attempted to keep up in all fields of police work. His officers are continually undergoing training in the latest methods of law enforcement, and they are regular members in the courses sponsored by the FBI.

Always interested in youth, the Santa Cruz police force has kept juvenile delinquency at a minimum. Headlines telling of wild teenage parties, kid narcotic addicts and other youthful crime activities are rare in Santa Cruz.

DONALD F. LYNN

TEENAGE SOLUTION

Youthful Don Latta, Capitola's 28-year-old chief of police, believes he has found the solution to stopping juvenile vandalism in resort areas.

When Latta took over the department 2½ years ago, Capitola was plagued by visiting teen-agers who visited the small Santa Cruz county resort city during the vacation periods. The youths, many who came from nearby Stanford university and San Jose State college, committed no major crimes, but some of their pranks proved very disturbing to the residents of the community.

drive 30 or 40 miles to get junior out of a jam.

Under Latta's direction, the department has also helped put an end to juvenile delinquency at home. He formed a rifle club and a hot rod group. Both have proved successful, and are well attended by youths from throughout the northern part of the county.

Actually, the Capitola police department takes in more than just the city of Capitola. It is a district, and includes portion of nearby Soquel and Live Oak.

Capitola has two full-time men on its tized and help out when an emergency arises outside their immediate area.

Since taking over the department, Latta has modernized his office to keep it up with the times. He has put in a modern record system, bought camera and fingerprint equipment. Latta now believes his department is as modern as any small force in the state.

While Latta's methods of cutting down youthful pranks may not have sat very well with some parents, his registration program has brought forth some fine compliments.

THE BEACH AT CAPITOLA

Latta, who stands six-foot, five inches, soon found that lectures and fines did not have much effect. So he devised a system whereby a violator had to call his parents immediately, day or night, and tell them to come and get him.

Parents who were wont to laugh at the pranks of their youngsters during the daytime, soon wiped the smiles off their faces when dragged out of bed in the early hours of the morning and forced to staff, Latta and one assistant, Martin Berghold. But during the summer months when the population swells to three or four times its normal size of 2,000, an additional six or seven men are hired.

The department works closely with Sheriff J. R. Devitt and his office. The sheriff's department handles all the radio work for the small department, and in exchange, Latta and his staff are depu-

More than once the Capitola PD spent many hours looking for a youngster who was needed at home because of an emergency. So Latta contacted the student bodies of nearby colleges and high schools and told the students that if they would register with his department he would deliver messages to and from parents.

The system proved a big success, and last year a total of 340 students took part

DEVITT TO RETIRE

Santa Cruz county will lose a faithful and honest servant, and the law enforcement profession one of its keenest and most fearless members when Sheriff J. R. (Bob) Devitt turns in his badge this coming January.

Devitt has served the people of this small Monterey bay area county for 39 years, and if he chose to run again he could probably serve double that number. But at 61 years of age, the still energetic sheriff believes it is time for him to step aside.

Vast changes have taken place in the sheriff's office since Devitt took control. The department had only five employees, including the sheriff when Devitt went into office in 1934. It now employs a total of 33, including matrons and a secretarial staff. Where there were three old-fashioned touring cars there are now seven high-compression autos that can whip the deputies from one end of the country to the other in a matter of minutes.

A complete radio system has been inmost important improvements made since taking office.

"Our radio system has enabled us to completely cover the county," he says, "and, of course, makes it doubly tough on criminals."

Another addition since Devitt took over is a night and day patrol system throughout the 435 miles of the county. A sheriff's patrol car is within a few minutes notice no matter where you live in this small, but mountainous community.

SUMMERTIME AT SANTA CRUZ

A native of Felton, Devitt first went to work as a member of the county's engineering department in 1915. He remained there until 1928 when he joined Sheriff Nick Sinnott as undersheriff. A position he held for three years.

In 1934, Devitt ran for sheriff for the first time and emerged victorious. Since then he has served five consecutive terms in the tough office before deciding to call it quits.

stalled, and the sheriff's office not only carries its own messages, but handles work for the county coroner, county engineering department, Capitola's police department and five independent merchant patrols. It is a far cry from the one-way system that was working when Devitt too over.

Devitt has also installed a complete record system in the office. He considers the radio and record system as the two

Santa Cruz county is lucky from a crime standpoint, according to Devitt, in that it is off the main line of big highways and railroads. And as a result has a low number of major crimes.

"Our biggest problem," Devitt claims, "is one that is somewhat unusual." He is speaking of cabin pilfering. Santa Cruz, of course, is a resort center, and thousands of persons from outside the county

AIRBORNE PRISONERS

In January 1948 chiefly through the efforts of Sergeant Eldon Heck, (now Lieutenant) of the Santa Clara County Sheriff's Office, a tremendous step forward was taken increasing the efficiency of the department in charge of prisoner transportation. Heck, who had been with the Sheriff's Department but one year was quick to recognize the need for efficient, safe, inexpensive prisoner transporting.

He realized almost immediately the antiquity in the present system of prisoner transport. Heck served as a flyer with the Army Air Corps in the 156th wing battalion, 8th fighter command and was a commercial pilot even before entering the service. It can therefore be easily understood with his flying experience that he recognized the man hours and expense involved as needless waste. Each time Eldon Heck was sent to pick up prisoners in Los Angeles or San Diego he was required to be away from home three days and drive an estimated 1100 to 1200 miles. The county allowed $11 per man per twenty four hours and an additional twelve ($12) per day wages for each of the two deputies making the trip. The mileage expense cost 7c per mile figuring depreciation and operation. The combined expenses at a minimum would total $199.00 and this expense of course was carried by the County of Santa Clara.

Keeping these figures in mind Heck proceeded to gather information on air travel and time involved. He collected the data and presented his ideas to Sheriff Hornbuckle who was quick to recognize the advantages of air travel.

The collected data recorded the trip at a leisurely two hours, 20 minutes from San Jose to San Diego and involved $20 in wages. The total time round trip was less than five hours and a rate of around $110 for the plane and fuel was charged. This gave a total expense of $130 or a savings of $69 on one trip.

It was arranged to rent a plane on contract and pay only the flying time. The department was given the key to the plane and given explicit rights to a D17 Stagger Wing Beach Craft with a 450 H.P. Pratt Whitney Engine. This plane has a five passenger cabin and a cruising speed of 190 miles per hour.

Extra equipment was installed for more safety and efficiency. A full flying panel is one factor plus a high and low frequency radio and also a special plane to patrol car communication. Everything was all set except who could and would fly the plane. Naturally this presented no problem since Elton Heck had long anticipated piloting the craft.

It took little time for the county to recognize the values of this new system. It so completely dwarfed the man hours and county expenses that over $9,000 was saved the first year.

How safe is it flying and are the prisoners had to handle in a plane? Many of these questions entered the minds of interested observers and were soon answered by Lieutenant Heck.

Should conditions be poor the trip is cancelled until favorable conditions for flying prevail.

When making a pick-up in another county the prisoners are driven to the airport at a pre-arranged time thus eliminating any lay-over.

An interesting highlight of Lt. Heck's flights occurred several years ago at the Salinas Airport. Heck and his deputy made a pickup of a large wide eyed negro boy. They were flying a new plane, a

SHERIFF HORNBUCKLE

Safety? The chances for accidents are far below that of driving a car. When flying rugged terrain and high mountains they are flown around if at all possible. Heck always tries to keep in a location where he can make a forced landing should some emergency arise. Thus he greatly limits additional hazards.

Are prisoners hard to handle? When one considers that perhaps one in one-hundred has ever flown and that one in one-thousand has ever flown in a small aircraft, the flying experience among prisoners is of course a very slim margin. Therefore it is usually a new experience and quite often a frightening one. Being suspended in the air is a great psychological factor and the prisoners are well behaved, cooperating in every way.

Another important factor of safety is the weather checking before take-off.

Cessina 170. This particular type plane was used for training student pilots and was equipped with a "stall horn." This "stall horn" automatically blows when the plane gets into a stalling position, to warn the pilot. As the story goes, the men took off into the North and just cleared the ground when the engine stopped without warning. Heck quickly made a 180° turn and headed back to the field. At the moment of the turn the "stall horn" blasted out and startled the prisoner. The plane pancaked in without damage and Heck and his deputy asked the prisoner how he felt—"Boss," he answered, "when I saw you sweating and heard that noise, I thought it was Gabriel blowin' his horn."

The use of the Sheriff's Department plane is not solely for transporting pris-

ASSOCIATED PUBLIC COMMUNICATIONS OFFICERS

JOHN ATKINSON, *President*THOMAS A. BAYLEY, Secretary

The February 11th meeting of the Associated Public Communications Officers, Inc., was called to order at 11:15 a.m. by the President, Art McDole, with 37 members and guests in attendance. The meeting was held at Vahls, in Alviso and the host was Robert Mason of the Santa Clara County.

The minutes of the January meeting were read and approved. The Treasurer's report showed a balance of $487.00 on hand as of February 10, 1954, with all bills paid.

President McDole appointed the following committees for this year:

Membership: Mason, Chairman, Freeman and Mayr.

Procedure and Operation: Lewis, Chairman, Bogardus, Keller and Atkinson.

Teletype: Huston, Chairman, George Burton and Harrington.

Commercial Relations: Olson, Chairman, Robertson and Parmenter.

Frequency & Engineering: McMurphy, Chairman, Bayley and Atkinson.

The President stated that starting with the March meeting the Secretary would call the roll of the members.

Membership applications of Russ Pattison as a Commercial Member and Eugene Huston as an Active Member were approved on a motion by McMurphy, seconded by Bayley.

The President then called for the report of the Frequency and Engineering Committee. Chairman McMurphy recommended approval of the frequency of 155.31 mc, base and mobile, for the city of Walnut Creek. This was approved on a motion by Keller, seconded by Freeman.

McMurphy also reported on FCC Docket 10869 which proposes licensing fees by the FCC. Bob Mason brought to the attention of the membership that it appears San Francisco and San Mateo County are not maintaining continuous monitoring watches on the point-to-point system as there is difficulty in contacting them.

President McDole reported on the methods and the attempt by the Telephone Company to have the favorable comments filed by Monterey County on Docket 10777 withdrawn. He reported that the Board of Supervisors, after an open discussion refused to take any action in withdrawing the comments.

The meeting was adjourned for lunch at 12:00 Noon.

During lunch our host introduced his guests, Commissioner Roger Nash and Chief Henry Lingua of the Central Fire Protection District of Santa Clara County. The President then called for introduction of members and their guests.

The meeting was called back to order at 1:10 p.m. by President McDole. He then introduced Vic Zacharia of Zack's Radio, who spoke briefly on industrial close circuit TV. He then introduced a crew from RCA who put on a very enlightening demonstration of RCA's new close circuit TVI.

Chief Simpson of Monterey then spoke on some of the problems the Administrator finds in communications and gave some suggestions on how communications personnel can assist the Administrator.

Mason reported on the results on the 450 mc survey which was run between Mt. Diablo, Copernicus Peak and near Blue Ridge Mountain. He stated that communications was 100% between these points.

The Secretary read an invitation from CPRA to hold the next joint meeting in Visalia on May 14th and 15th. On a motion by LeBouef, seconded by Keller, the membership voted to accept CPRA's invitation.

General discussion on standard operating procedure followed. It was brought out that point-to-point procedure is pending installation of selective calling on the point-to-point. McMurphy pointed out that the cooperation of the State Division of Communications has not been very good and their help is needed on the project. It was also pointed out that the frequency of 154.71 mc is available to eventually replace the 73.26 mc frequency on Mt. Diablo. The change from one frequency to the other rests with the State of California and from all indications they were unaware of the problem.

On a motion by Mason, seconded by Bayley, the Secretary was directed to notify the State Division of Communications that the frequency of 154.71 mc is available to replace 73.26 mc on the point-to-point on Mt. Diablo. The Secretary was further directed to request the State make immediate arrangements to duplicate the 73.26 transmitter with a 154.71 mc transmitter to operate simultaneously with 73.26 until the frequency is no longer available. The funds for such transmitter having been included in the present budget on the Civil Defense law enforcement service. A copy of this letter to be directed to the Director of Finance.

On a motion by McMurphy, seconded by Mason, an invitation was extended to Preston Allen, Chief of the State Division of Communications to become an active member of this Organization.

The Secretary requested a clarification on the use of double and single postcards and permission to have addressograph plates made for the mailing list. On a motion by Lewis, seconded by Bayley, the Association approved the addressograph plates and authorized the Secretary to exercise his own discretion on the use of single or double postcards.

Jim Lewis of Marin County offered to host the March 11th meeting at Hamilton Air Force Base.

PISTOL POINTING

By J. ROSS DUNNIGAN

Usually the month of January in any year is tuff going for the pistolers as there are no major matches around for them to go to and strut their stuff. Its equally tuff on the writers as then they have to use their imaginations and whatever material they can manage to scrape together. I am fortunate this year as I have a wealth of dope for the readers and in fact, I have so much I will be unable to use it all as my space in the "Journal" is limited.

First on the calendar is the Oakland club and their yearly booklet on the 1953 matches. Their booklet has not been released as yet as it is still in the process of being printed but the club secretary, Tom Monahan, kindly gave me the highlights of the book which will be sent out to the members in March so if yours is not on hand by then better get hold of someone and ask how come?

Nineteen-hundred and fifty-three was the Chinese year of the Snake and was purported to be bad luck for all sons of the celestial empire and many of the orientals tread most lightly last year less their already foredoained bad luck be worst. One worthy son of Cathay, Bob Chow, by name, evidently didn't take his Confu-top championships around these parts. He won the San Francisco pistol range cham-pistol championship of the Oakland Club. Bob, as you probably know is one of San Francisco's leading gunsmiths and has his own shop out on Mission street but he has a bad habit (and this is right from the shooters, too) of winning a heck of a lot of matches and giving the other shooters a pretty ruff time of it. The second place high aggregate winner was Sgt. Karl Schaugaard of the San Francisco Police Department while Milt Klipfel, of the California Highway Patrol placed third. This championship is obtained by taking the highest 15 scores shot during 1953 and are for the three

The only records set in Oakland in 1953 were set by the three top winners with Schaugaard shooting in the .22 caliber 20 shot timed-fire match shot a 200+ 50—a real new record. In the .45 matches Chow set a new high in the Camp Perry with a 295 while Klipfel jerked his way to a 289 in the National Match course. The 289 over the National match course is really shooting with that .45 canon.

STANISLAUS PEACE OFFICERS

Three of California's finest peace officers defend and enforce the law in Stanislaus County.

In Modesto, a city of about 35,000 population situated in the heart of one of California's richest agricultural districts, Chief James C. Neel, a progressive, modern minded law enforcement officer, directs the destiny of the police department.

the narcotics bureau and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

In addition to his own force, Neel invited officers from other Stanislaus County Police Departments and Sheriff Dan Kelsay's office to attend.

He declared that the constant development of new techniques by criminals requires continuing exchange of the latest ideas on law enforcement from agen-and has continued through the various phases of police work.

Working in close harmony with Neel is Sheriff Kelsay, a man whose office produced one of the outstanding examples of detective work in connection with a homicide case in recent years.

With little to go on aside from a twenty-two shell which was not where it should have been, Sheriff Kelsay and his

Recently, with an eye toward improving the technical knowledge of his department, Chief Neel has inaugurated a stepped-up training program.

The program covers narcotics control, the laws of arrest, police procedure, defensive tactics and traffic accident investigation.

Cooperating agencies included the office of District Attorney F. W. Reyland, Jr., the state department of education, cies on the state, county, city and national level.

"Through a careful selection of personnel and a well rounded, continuous training program, police agencies can raise their standard of service to the public," Neel stated. "The training program is part of a long range program to improve our service," the chief concluded.

The program started with a lecture on the laws of arrest early in the year

THE DERAAS MURDER

By WALTER R. HECOX

The rich black earth was freshly plowed and moist so that a thick layer clung to the feet of the farm hands as they cut across the field toward their morning chores. A heavy dew had washed the grass so that it was bright and gleaming in the warm spring sunlight. Nearby the Tuolumne River flowed peacefully toward its junction with the San Joaquin, filled to its broad brim by the melting snows of the High Sierras. A distant farmhouse was half hidden by its border of trees.

last night and didn't know the field was plowed. Then when it bogged down left it here and went for a tow."

The farm hands changed direction so as to pass closer to the mired vehicle. Its rear wheels were deep in the soft earth and a low mound of dirt had been thrown behind them, apparently while the driver spun them in a hopeless attempt to escape the muddy grip. Teekle and Welch were very close before they noticed the body. It was half covered by loam flung from the wheels. For a

"Leonard," Teekle asked, "do you know who it is?"

"It's Eilif Deraas." Snapped back into reality by the sound of his own voice, Welch started forward, but the restraining hand of his companion arrested the movement.

"It's too late to help him," Teekle remarked. "We'd better call the sheriff."

"The sheriff?"

"That's right, the sheriff," Teekle repeated dully. "Look at his head. What could this be except murder?" The pair

The black coupe and the grisly spectacle beside it were the only discordant notes in the pastoral beauty of the landscape.

The farm hands passed nearby. At first the body was hidden from their view, but one of them, C. M. Teekle, noticed the strange position of the car.

"Funny place to leave a car," he remarked to his companion, Leonard Welch. "Must have driven into the soft sand and got stuck."

Welch nodded. "Probably drove up moment the farm hands stood frozen in their tracks.

The dead man was lying on his back on the right side of the coupe, his outstretched left hand almost touching the right rear wheel. His right arm was crumpled beneath him in a grotesque position. Congealed blood had gathered thickly behind his head and his flaxen Viking hair was stained rust brown. Two cold gray eyes, half open, stared vacantly at the farmhands, unwinking in the morning sun.

hurried to a nearby farmhouse and telephoned. Deputy Jack Hammett, of the Stanislaus County sheriff's office, answered.

"There's a dead man by a parked car that's stuck in the mud at the end of Vivian Avenue," Teekle told him. "I think he was murdered."

"I'll be right there," Hammett responded.

The deputy sheriff called Coroner George Sovern and the pair rushed to

A two-man juvenile bureau headed by Sgt. Ernie Marengi and Officer Tor Spindler keep a constant check on the doings of the youth of the community.

Huntsman has also interested himself in youth work. A lover of sports, he is president of the well-known Santa Cruz Seahawk Athletic club. The club, under his direction, has built a large athletic stadium and recreation area within the city, and also sponsors baseball and football teams. The stadium, which is the pride and joy of Huntsman's life, has become a mecca for the sports-minded youth of Santa Cruz.

What is the most important thing to keep in mind as a police chief?

"Treat everybody on an equal basis, and treat people the way you like to be treated yourself," Huntsman claims. "In that manner, you will make a difficult and delicate job easier for yourself and for others. Public relations is an important part of law enforcement."

Although eligible to retire now, Chief Huntsman has no definite plans as yet, and he is planning to "stay on for a while." "After all," he comments, "after 20 years of service I'm not even at the top step by pay classification. There's still time..."

Huntsman gives a lot of credit to the people of Santa Cruz for giving him a free hand in running his department according to his ideas and ideals. "The people, and the various city councils and mayors have always been reasonable and kind," he says. "We've tried to give them the best department we know how to make. We'll continue to do so if that is what the people want."

DUPLICATE KEYS

To avoid the embarrassing delay caused by being accidentally locked out of your automobile, the California State Automobile Association suggests that extra duplicate keys should be obtained from a locksmith. Tape one to some portion of the chassis and place the other one in your billfold. When an emergency arises, either will be available for use.

own small cabins and summer resorts. These residences, which range from log cabins to swanky mansions, are vacant a great part of the year.

"We are plagued constantly," Devitt says, "by the owners of these homes reporting to us when they arrive in the summer that their premises have been entered, and valuables stolen. The normal housebreaking is discovered within a matter of hours or a few days, but in Santa Cruz it may be months.

"And if you think it isn't tough to solve a house robbery in which the trail has been cold for as long as six months, well, try it sometime," the youngish looking Devitt says.

One thing that makes Devitt very happy is that the juvenile problem is light. "Sure we have the kids who break and enter cabins, but dope and the major crimes by juveniles that you hear and read about in other sections of the state are virtually non-existent in Santa Cruz county.

Despite being one of the chief political figures in the county for the past 20 years, Devitt does not believe the sheriff's office should be an elective one. "It is my belief," he claims, "that the sheriff should be an appointive official just as most chief of police are now selected.

He points out that every four years a sheriff must forget his official duties for several months to campaign. "It makes an officer more vulnerable if he must depend on politics to retain his job," Devitt says.

Devitt not only believes that his office should be appointive, but it is his belief that in coming years law enforcement officials will need far more formal education than is now required.

"I can see the day," he states, "when every deputy sheriff and police officer will need a college degree. Why some forces already demand police training before they hire a man, and I think it is a great thing."

But before the public can demand college trained personnel, Devitt says they must be accustomed to higher salaries. "You can't expect a man who has spent a large sum of money for his education to take a position that hardly provides a decent standard of living," he says.

Devitt points out his own office as a good example. "We have a 50 per cent turnover in personnel every year, and it isn't because of the job or working conditions. The county of Santa Cruz, and most other counties are also guilty, just don't pay enough to keep good men," he says.

The veteran law enforcement official believes it is false economy to pay low salaries. "Because of it," he says, "we are forced to spend a great deal of time and money on training the constant stream of new personnel."

Santa Cruz county has not produced a great number of headline crime cases during the past 20 years, but one murder has become famous, and Sheriff Devitt played a large part in it.

We're speaking of the McMonigle murder case, one of the few murder convictions obtained when no trace of the body was ever found.

McMonigle was convicted of killing a 15-year-old Campbell high school girl in 1945 somewhere in Santa Cruz county, and throwing her body down "Devil's Slide" in San Mateo county.

Sheriff's Devitt and his staff trailed more than 1000 miles on various confessions made by the San Jose man on where he buried the body.

Now that his days of work are numbered, Devitt is making plans on how to spend his retirement. He expects to do quite a bit of traveling, though he still hasn't made any definite plans. "I do plan, though," he said, "to make sure to visit those spots where the fish are biting."

FULL HEADLIGHTS

Don't drive with only your parking lights at daybreak or dusk, advises the National Automobile Club. A poorly lighted car can be as great a danger as a car with no lights at all. If lights seem necessary, full headlights should be used.

COLOR VALUE

Light colored and highly transparent motor oils are obtained by certain refining processes, according to the National Automobile Club. The color of an oil is of little value to the consumer for judging its value as an engine lubricant but should assist in the detection of dirt or other foreign material. There is no known relation between color and service performance.

KEY NUMBERS

The back of the automobile registration card makes a fine place on which to write down the numbers of the vehicle's various keys, points out the National Automobile Club. The card usually is handy.

SAFETY AT HOME

Is your home really "safe"?

One of the easiest—and most economical—ways to insure a higher degree of safety in your home is to build one of the Safety Council recommended housekeeping closets.

"In this good looking cabinet that you can build yourself you can store most of the principal hazards to your children. Remember, more than 1700 little ones die each year because some adult left a gun, some paint thinner, ammonia, lye, or another deadly poison in a spot easily reached by a child," says Arnold E. Archibald, president of the San Francisco Chapter of the National Safety Council.

The housekeeping closet is designed to hold all of the more dangerous household items in, addition to serving as an adequate storeplace for brooms, brushes, carpet sweepers, and a host of other items that contribute to many home falls, Mr. Archibald reports.

"Lock up your home hazards in this neatly designed closet and remove temptation from your children. Permanent disfigurement or death is too great a price for them to pay for curiosity that you can eliminate by spending a few dollars and a few hours time," reminds Mr. Archibald.

Write today to the San Francisco Chapter, National Safety Council, 28 Geary Street, San Francisco 8, California, and ask for the free plans and description of the "safety" designed housekeeping closet.

past year. Through intelligent conclusions and smart interrogation, they were able to prove that Clarence had conspired with his father, Henry, to murder his mother. Henry is now awaiting execution and Clarence is in the custody of the juvenile authority.

Farther down the county Chief John J. Viarengo of Turlock is doing an outstanding job of maintaining law and order. The 1953 report of the Stanislaus County Grand Jury, which was not too complimentary to some prisons, declared:

"The Turlock jail is outstanding as to excellence of arrangement, maintenance and administration, particularly in relation to the manner in which the criminal and identification records are kept.

The department and the auxiliary earned the praise by overhauling the old jail in 1951 and 1952. Members, working on their own time, partitioned the office with sand blasted plywood. They divided the cavernous old station into an office for the chief, an interrogation room and reception room.

Keeping of proper criminal and identification records is relatively new also, being introduced by the former chief, Harry L. Oliver, and Chief John Viarengo.

By introduction of complex filing records, an officer now can put his finger on the record of any man booked at the jail.

The department also makes use of Federal Bureau of Investigation information on criminals and criminal activities, taking full advantage of the services offered by FBI in all phases of crime detection.

DEFECTIVE MUFFLER

A clogged muffler or a bent muffler tail pipe on your car can create sufficient back pressure to cause poor engine performance, states the California State Automobile Association.

ADJUST HEADLIGHTS

Keep your headlights properly adjusted so that the lower beams are not aimed upward into the approaching driver's eyes, advises the California State Automobile Association. If in doubt about the adjustment of the headlights on your automobile, have them checked at an official Light Testing station.

GOOD VISIBILITY

Keep your windshield glass and headlight lenses clean and windshield wipers in top working condition, says the California State Automobile Association.

Just a Few Notes Here and There

One of my first notes concerns Gloria Norton and to my mind there isn't a better all-around woman pistol shot in the whole dog-gone U.S.A. In looking over the list of women champions I was particularly interested in the records that Gloria holds or has tied. Out of 19 records, she now holds 11 and is tied in two others which leaves just six records that she does not have. It should be noted that some of the records she does not hold are matches she has not been able to shoot in—take for instance the .45 slow, rapid and timed matches, which matches are not fired at any of the registered ranges around her part of the country but I do feel certain that if she were to participate in any of these matches a few more records would be in her name. Here enters one of the things the shooters would love to see but mayhap never will. In the southern part of the state a new woman pistol champ has risen but her forte is the .45 cannon and her scores are really remarkable. She holds plenty of .45 records and that she does shoot this big handgun well is clearly shown by looking over the record book. A match between this .45 champ, Peg Culbertson and Gloria would really be something. But here is the rub. It seems as tho Gloria had to give up real pistol competition for two very good reasons, the first is that she is a housewife with a family to care for; secondly, the expenses of entering and practicing for the matches, as you well know, all takes a lot of the long green. It just doesn't seem right that right here in our own back yard we have the finest woman shot in the country and we are unable to see her perform in real competition due to expenses—and many others of us find ourselves in the same boat. Why couldn't Gloria's home town of Woodland Chamber of Commerce send her to the Regionals—just think of the wonderful notices Woodland could get from such a gesture. It kinda leaves me stumped as just what to do in such a case and I was wondering if any of the shooters had some ideas on the subject.

Speaking of the .45 cannon brings another notation on the calendar. I have been asked, mostly by new shooters, why, for instance, does a sharpshooter or expert drop down one class lower when the .45 match is on? The explanation is very simple especially if you shoot the .45 gun. The .45 is a ruff, tuff, rip-snortin' gun to handle and in order to give the shooters a break they are allowed to drop back one class until such time as they can climb back to their higher classification and believe me, brother, that takes a long, long time—sometime.

I see by the amount of material already given out I am about out of space so will close with just this one more question asked at the last San Francisco match. What is the meaning of the open class and who gets into it, especially as they have the master class? Some explanation is in order. The open class is just what it says—open to all classes for the top prize of the match. Just supposing that a marksman get real hot and shoots the highest score of the match he may elect to take the top medal in the open class or the first place medal in the marksman class, just as he chooses. This same goes for any other class to the shooter having the highest scores. The open class is used in San Francisco but there is no open class around these parts other than S. F.

INSTRUCTOR'S SCHOOL

High school teachers of driver education will study the newest developments in all aspects of highway transportation during a two-week course, June 21 to July 2, conducted at the Traffic Institute of Northwestern University in Evanston, Illinois.

The seminar for driver education teachers will be under the direction of F. R. Noffsinger, who is in charge of course development at the Traffic Institute. He was formerly dean of the School of Commerce of St. Louis University and pioneered in training teachers in driver education when he was education consultant for the American Automobile Association.

The course, said Mr. Noffsinger, will enrich the teacher's knowledge and add new meaning to the teaching of driving both in and out of the classroom.

"Eighty-five per cent of traffic accidents today are related to faulty driving," said Mr. Noffsinger. "Thorough driver education will greatly reduce this percentage, and cut down the accident rate. This is largely the job of the driver education teachers."

Topics to be presented in the seminar for driver education teachers will be:

Recent Findings in the Nature and Characteristics of the Driver.

New Problems and Solutions in Traffic Engineering.

The Advance of Driver Licensing.
Programs of Driver Improvement.
Latest Trends in Motor Vehicle Design and Construction.

Traffic Courts—Their Place in Traffic Safety.

Uniform Traffic Laws.
Streets and Highways for Tomorrow.
How an Accident Happens.
Successes in the Coordinated Attack on the Traffic Problem.

Philosophy of Traffic Law Enforcement.

Insurance and Civil Liability in Automobile Accidents.

New Developments in School Traffic Safety Problems.

Successful Community Traffic Safety Programs.

Highway Transportation System—Existent and Problems.

Preventing Accidents Through Vehicle Maintenance and Inspection.

Developments in Accident Investigation and Reporting.

Role of Public Information in Accident Prevention.

Support Agencies in the Highway Transportation System.

Training Needs and Facilities in the Highway Transportation System.

Additional sessions will be devoted to the discussion of the material presented in terms of its use in teaching driver education in the high schools.

Leading traffic authorities who will present the various topics include: J. Stannard Baker, director of research, Traffic Institute; George W. Barton, traffic engineering consultant; George C. Bowers, director of field service, Traffic Division, International Association of Chiefs of Police, and Traffic Institute staff including: Gerald O'Connell, director of training; Glenn V. Carmichael, assistant director of Training, and Robert L. Donigan, Counsel.

DEATH ON WRONG SIDE

Traffic fatalities resulting from driving on the wrong side of the road have almost tripled during the past five years.

Truth of this statement is borne out by a review of California Highway Patrol accident reports for the past few years. In 1949 driving on the wrong side of the road accounted for 4.2 per cent of total violations in fatal accidents. Last year this percentage jumped to 11. The increase has been steady during the past five years.

Patrol Commissioner B. R. Caldwell pointed out that these drivers were not in the act of passing cars nor swerving to avoid other accidents, again emphasizing the human frailties in individual cases.

"Drowsiness, drunkenness, fatigue, and inattention are among the reasons for this increase in serious accidents of this type," he explained.

"Any motorists who feels ill, sleepy, or unable to concentrate on driving, should pull immediately to the side of the road and park off the highway. A nap, a cup of coffee, or some exercise will head off the trouble before it starts.

"It seems almost unbelievable that eleven per cent of the violations noted in fatal collisions last year were for driving on the wrong side of the road. Among the first instructions a beginning driver receives is to stay on the right side of the road," Caldwell declared.

KNOW YOUR NOISES

In the lexicon of the automobile mechanic, according to the National Automobile Club, a squeak is recognized as an urgent demand for oil, a rattle the product of looseness, and a hum a very fast rattle with the individual beats so closely spaced as to produce a sound that is not unmusical even though it is exceptionally irritating.

McCLURE LEAVES BEAT

A month or so after San Francisco Examiner reporter Stuart McClure returned from World War II Infantry service in Europe his city editor called him up to his desk.

"Mac," he said, "I want you to go down to the Hall of Justice and cover the night police beat for a couple of weeks until we get some one to fill in permanently."

Last month, more than seven years later, McClure, 38, turned in his special police reporter's star to Chief Michael Gaffey and left the Examiner's employ to enter the political arena as a candidate at the June 8th primary election for the First District Board of Equalization seat now held by George R. Reilly.

During the years intervening, McClure served with three police chiefs in addition to Gaffey—Dullea, Riordan and Mitchell—and became known to the entire San Francisco force and to many other law enforcement officers in the Bay Area as a fair-minded, thoroughly competent reporter.

STUART McCLURE

In turning in his badge and credentials as a special police officer, a status held by all San Francisco newsmen who regularly cover the police beat, McClure, in a formal statement to the Chief, said in part:

"It has been a great pleasure as well as a great honor to serve with you. The San Francisco Police Department is deserving of the outstanding reputation which it has throughout the nation for its high level of efficiency in all phases of police work. I have learned a great deal while working with you and will always carry with me the highest respect for you and your Department.

"Please extend to your officers and men on my behalf my genuine appreciation for their cooperation and assistance throughout the years of my work with them. I wish you and them the best of everything for the future."

McClure first entered the newspaper field 15 years ago this month in the classified advertising department of the Examiner, subsequently moving as a reporter to the old San Jose Mercury Herald where he also covered police, and then returning as a reporter to the Examiner about a year before entering World War II military service.

Recent highlight of this outstanding newspaperman's career was the receipt in January of the Pall Mall Award for "distinguished service in the field of journalism" and the radio dramatization of his work with San Francisco homicide Inspectors Al Nelder and John O'Haire in the apprehension of Robert Ranson, 19-year old juvenile gang leader who shot five youths in Civic Center following a ball at the Civic Auditorium two years ago.

He was also involved closely with the press coverage of the recent $500,000 Moskowitz kidnaping, having been on duty at the Hall of Justice both at the time the story first broke and in the early morning hours several silent days later when the young real estate broker was recovered unharmed.

Throughout his years of newspapering, McClure has maintained a lively interest in the affairs of his community and State, playing an active role in more than a score of activities designed to improve existing conditions.

Initially active in the veterans' movement as a Post commander and State officer of the Veterans of Foreign Wars and a member of the American Legion and the Veterans Political Council, he turned to partisan politics and became successively a member, and in some cases an officer, of the Young Republicans, the Republican Assembly, the San Francisco Republican County Central Committee and the Republican State Central Committee.

At the same time he has been active in the local unit of the CIO American Newspaper Guild and in such organizations as the World Affairs Council of Northern California, the San Francisco Council for Civic Unity and the San Francisco Planning and Housing Association. for Handicapped Children, he is also a former director of the San Francisco Press and Union League Club and vice chairman of the Federal Rent Advisory Board for the San Francisco Area.

McClure is also known in the seven-county First District, which encompasses San Francisco, San Mateo, Santa Clara, Santa Cruz, Monterey, San Benito and San Luis Obispo Counties, as a staff officer of Northern California's 49th National Guard Division and as a former officer of the alumni association of the University of California, from which he was graduated in 1937.

A member of the Native Sons of the Golden West, he is the grandson of the late A. A. Moore, pioneer Northern California attorney and early day district attorney of Alameda County, where his father, Donald McClure, also served as a deputy district attorney with Chief Justice Earl Warren following World War I. His Great-grandfather, Richard A. McClure of Mission San Jose, served in the California Legislature during the 1870's. The newsman-turned politico is married, the father of 3 boys and a girl and resides at 2700 Scott St., San Francisco.

COLD ENGINE

Contamination of the oil in the crankcase occurs much more rapidly in an automobile engine that is not driven far enough to thoroughly warm it up, the California State Automobile Association states. The automatic choke with which most engines are equipped causes raw fuel to reach the crankcase when the engine is cold. Furthermore, condensed moisture and gasoline on cold cylinder walls drains into the crankcase where it is eventually converted to sludge by combining with other materials.

CAR LOOTERS

Valuables should always be removed from an automobile left standing for any length of time, particularly at night, urges the California State Automobile Association. Car looting is increasing and thieves who take cameras, clothing, suitcases and other expensive items from automobiles, are difficult to apprehend and the stolen goods rarely recovered. Don't leave easily lifted articles in the car, even if it is locked.

STOP FENDERIZING

Dents and nicks on fenders indicate careless driving. Drivers can stop "fenderizing" one another by driving with more courtesy and carefulness, advises California State Automobile Association.

William M. Whelan, Special Agent in Charge of the San Francisco Office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, announced recently that an FBI Law Enforcement Conference on Interstate Transportation of Stolen Property will be held in April in San Francisco.

Whelan said more than 100 conferences of this type have been scheduled this year by the FBI on a regional basis throughout the United States and are designed to cover confidence game swindles, fraudulent checks, major thefts and other varied violations which fall within the classification of interstate transportation of stolen property. The conferences will be aimed at bringing about additional coordination among law enforcement agencies and improved efficiency in dealing with these crimes. They will be operated on a forum basis providing for a mutual exchange of information and knowledge by all participants.

Whelan illustrated the importance of the meetings by pointing out that the FBI's investigative activity under the Interstate Transportation of Stolen Property Statute has increased greatly during the past several years. For example, he said there were 407 convictions resulting from FBI cases in this category during the 1953 fiscal year, an increase of 15 per cent over the preceding year. He stated he feels the conferences will be of much value to law enforcement agencies, not only in this area, but throughout the country.

Although the conferences will cover numerous types of crimes, Whelan said the three main phases of discussion will concern fraudulent checks, confidence game swindles, and major thefts.

In the panel on fraudulent checks, the discussion will include information concerning the methods of operation most often used by bad check artists, the jurisdiction of the FBI, the cooperative role of the FBI's Laboratory and Identification Division, and the availability of the FBI's National Fraudulent Check File to local authorities in a criminal case even though a Federal violation may not be involved.

The discussion on confidence game swindles will relate closely to the major theft panel, since interstate transportation of more than $5,000 often is involved in the dubious dealings of the "con man."

The panel on major thefts, Mr. Whelan said, will provide for an explanation of the facilities of the FBI which are available for the use of local authorities in investigating such cases. In addition, it will be pointed out that the FBI will enter into active investigation any time there is an indication that stolen property or stolen currency having a value of $5,000 or more has been moved in interstate commerce. Specialized thefts, such as jewels and furs, as well as the activity of "fences" of stolen property, also will be covered on the agenda.

Whelan said this conference will be attended by local, state and county law enforcement officers, FBI personnel, representatives from banks, hotel associations and business groups, and officials from other interested organizations.

According to Special Agent in Charge Whelan, the FBI has held similar conferences throughout the country for the past two years. In 1952, there were 131 auto theft conferences which were attended by 8,707 individuals representing 3,121 agencies. There were 133 conferences in 1953 on thefts from interstate shipment. They were attended by 8,702 persons representing 4,159 agencies.

CARS IN CALIFORNIA

A grand total of 225,811 motor vehicles entered California during the month of January, 1954, according to the National Automobile Club. Of this total, which is just 577 vehicles less than that for January, 1953, 200,041 were passenger cars, 22,085 were commercial trucks, and 3,685 were busses.

CALL PATROL OFFICE

If a driver is involved in a traffic accident in which there is death or injury on any highway outside an incorporated city, an immediate call to the nearest office of the California Highway Patrol will bring expert assistance. Such emergency calls can be made collect.

"This reminder is issued because information arriving at Headquarters indicates that many recent accidents occurring in unincorporated areas have not been promptly reported," stated B. R. Caldwell, Patrol Commissioner.

"In order to help motorists, offices of the Highway Patrol will accept charges on incoming calls reporting accidents," he added.

The law states that any driver involved in an accident in which there is death or personal injury must report the accident in writing to the Highway Patrol within 24 hours provided the accident occurs outside the limits of any city.

In the event that the driver of any vehicle is unable to report the accident and there is another occupant in the vehicle, that occupant shall report the accident or cause the report to be made.

These required reports are in addition to Financial Responsibility reports or others that are required to be submitted.

HAYES HEADS DRIVE

Arthur Hull Hayes, vice president of the Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., will direct the planned expanded 1954 accident prevention fund raising campaign of the San Francisco Chapter of the National Safety Council, Arnold E. Archibald, president of the Chapter, announced recently.

Hayes was appointed general chairman for the drive following a special meeting of the Council Board of Directors where it was decided to place the problem of financial aid for the Chapter squarely before the public in a city-wide campaign.

Archibald reports that the present financial support for the Green Cross work here in San Francisco is received mainly through business and industrial memberships.

The Safety Council plans to expand its activities in 1954, but the present memberships are not sufficient within themselves to meet the increased demands for accident prevention. Because the public benefits most from National Safety Council activities the Board decided that a general appeal must be made to meet the increased safety problems facing San Francisco.

Upon accepting the appointment as general chairman Hayes stated:

"If we are to fight the growing menace of accidents in our city, with its aftermath of tragedy and expense, we must place in the hands of our Safety Council, the financial weapons with which to do the job. The San Francisco Chapter is not subsidized by any governmental organization, nor does it receive aid from welfare organizations. Yet the National Safety Council is the only organization of its kind that has received a federal charter recognizing the work it does in saving lives.

"Industry and business, which have long recognized the need for the council, should not be asked to bear all the financial burden for such a comprehensive program which in reality is beneficial to everyone."

"When you consider that the Safety Council has been largely responsible for consistently reducing the accident death rate in San Francisco since the local chapter was founded in 1945, it becomes obvious that this vitally needed life-saving activity deserves the support of everyone. For safety is everybody's job," Hayes said.

The community-wide campaign will embrace the various civic bodies, clubs, fraternal groups and organizations, racial and minority groups, professions, etc.

JUNE 1ST DEADLINE

June 1 is the deadline for applying for grant-in-aid awards for the 1954-55 Traffic Police Administration Training Program conducted by the Traffic Institute of Northwestern University, Franklin M. Kreml, director, has announced.

Applications are now being accepted for this nine-month training program at the Traffic Institute, 1704 Judson Ave., Evanston, Ill. The program begins September 23, 1954, and continues through June 13, 1955.

Funds for sixteen $1,650 fellowships and sixteen $500 tuition scholarships have been provided by the Kemper Foundation for Traffic Safety, Chicago, Ill., to enable police departments to send qualified officers for training in the execution of effective traffic supervision and accident prevention programs.

"To increase the possibility of having a man selected from their departments, police chiefs who are interested are encouraged to permit all policemen of the rank of sergeant and above to submit applications to them," said Mr. Kreml. "If they need help in establishing a basis for evaluating these applicants, Traffic Institute staff members will be glad to assist them."

Eight fellowships and eight scholarships are provided for municipal police officers. The same number are awarded to state and county officers. A limited number of qualified students will be admitted on a tuition-paying basis.

The training program, designed especially for staff and command traffic personnel comprises four major areas of study and activity: 1) Problems in Highway Transportation, and the agencies concerned with these problems; 2) Functions of Traffic Police, covering accident investigation, traffic law enforcement, and traffic direction; 3) Management of Police Traffic Services; and 4) general education courses which are arranged to increase the competence of the student and to provide answers to problems in traffic police management which are found in the fields of psychology, economics, sociology, and political science.

The program consists of classroom work, supplemented by field laboratory, and study projects, and guidance and specialized conferences.

Factors which are considered in the selection of police department representatives and granting of awards are: 1) the applicant's ability and potential usefulness to his department; 2) the extent of the accident and congestion problem in his city or state; 3) the need of the department for trained personnel, and 4) his department's plans for the profitable use of his training to further improve its traffic supervision program.

To be eligible to compete for admission and for award consideration, the applicants must: 1) be not more than 45 years of age; 2) be a police officer in active service in a municipal, township, county, state, or provincial department; 3) have at least three years of police experience; 4) have the approval of his chief; 5) be assured of a leave of absence—or equivalent temporary status—from his department, during which his salary will be paid; 6) have the assurance of his superior that he will be returned to active service upon completing the program; 7) agree to return to his department for at least three years, and 8) be in good health and physically fit.

The Kemper Foundation for Traffic Safety has been one of the principal supporters of the Traffic Institute since it was established in 1936. More than 700 men have attended the twenty-eight previous courses in traffic police administration. Nearly 4,000 judges and prosecutors, driver training instructors, motor vehicle fleet supervisors, chief driver license examiners, and military personnel have attended short courses, conferences, and seminars at the Traffic Institute.

SIGNS ALONG HIGHWAY

Signs along our highways are posted to warn you of dangers ahead, advises the National Automobile Club. Read them, heed them, and keep yourself safe.

KEEP TO THE RIGHT

Whether you're on a three, four or six lane highway, the California State Automobile Association urges you to drive in the right-hand lane unless you are passing another vehicle. It's safer and if others are driving faster than you, the law requires you to keep to the right even if you're driving at limit speed.

TRY OTHER FILAMENT

The odds are that both filaments of a headlight bulb have not burned out at the same time, points out the National Automobile Club. Rather than drive with only one light, switch to the beam that provides that both lights will operate.

BEFORE ADOBE BRICKS

The present method in the use of adobe bricks for building purposes in New Mexico, according to the National Automobile Club, was preceded by the ancient process of puddling the "mud" into the walls in stratified layers.

APRIL FIRST

Practical joke players abound in every community. Their friends and acquaintances are generally on the alert for them, and occasionally turn the joke on their prankful friend. But, it is quite different in the case of the crude amateurs who operate only on April 1st of each year.

Some of this latter class do really go far beyond the funny stage and cause trouble and expense in addition to loss of valuable time spent visiting designated persons or places.

The Police Department is unwittingly a factor in many shallow April 1st jokes.

The joker gives his victim the Police Department telephone number and instructions to call: Mr. Kopp, Flatty, et cetera.

Many of the victims telephoning the Police Department for: Mr. Sargent, Kopp, Kaboose, Gunn, Cuffs, Coffin, or Lamorgue, sense the joke instantly, laugh heartily, and tell the police officer answering the telephone they will remember not to be caught again next year. But, about the other victims?

To some people a joke is a deadly wrong, and quite a large percentage of April 1st joke victims on police station phones could definitely have a Code charge placed against them for the sizzling things they yell when they happen to ring in and ask for one of the gentlemen mentioned above.

HELP THE BOY

"Help a boy to help himself", we say—Ah, a wonderful thought and a wonderful way, To make the alloy that shall take the pure gold, Of his heart, of his dreams, of his energies bold, And mix with the brass of his courage and nerve And the steel of his muscles and make them all serve.

Give those fingers a chance to pick out what will win him,
Give those muscles a chance to develop within him,
Give the heart the right beat, and 'twill need no repression,
Give the brain the right thought and 'twill find full expression,
Give this and the soil of the street will not stain
The body, the hands, the heart or the brain.

Do this and the boy by this definite plan
Is transmuted in God's human mint to a Man.

SHORT COURSES

Two basic functions of traffic police—accident investigation and traffic law enforcement—will be covered this spring in two short courses conducted at the Traffic Institute of Northwestern University in Evanston, Ill.

The first of these courses, "Accident Investigation — Administration and Techniques," will be offered April 26 to May 14. "Traffic Law Enforcement—Administration and Techniques" will be conducted May 10 to 28.

Men wishing to broaden their study of the traffic problem may attend both courses. The five days in which the two courses overlap are devoted to the same general subject, so that those who are finishing the course in Accident Investigation will be able to enroll in the second course without missing any material.

The Accident Investigation course is open to commanding officers of traffic divisions, and officers or potential officers in charge of accident investigation.

"Before a good job of preventing accidents can be done," said Franklin M. Kreml, director of the Traffic Institute, "a city or state must first have the facts about how many traffic accidents are occurring in the community. He must know where, when and why they happen."

"These facts can be obtained through good accident investigation by trained police officers. This course is offered to teach police officers to train their men in accident investigation and to organize, direct and supervise accident investigation."

Some topics covered in the course are: nature of traffic accidents and their causes, purposes of accident investigation, investigating late-reported accidents, fatal and hit-and-run investigation.

Determining speed from skidmarks, interrogation of suspects and witnesses, preparation of cases and court work, and uses of the accident report form also are included.

Students will be taught to reconstruct an accident to determine the cause, to train the investigator, and to organize and equip an accident investigation unit.

"Equally valuable for traffic improvement is the traffic law enforcement course," said Kreml. "This course will give the student information which will help his police department to make the best possible use of the manpower available."

Included in the enforcement courses are: reasons for traffic law enforcement, essentials of traffic law, and tactics, techniques, policies, measurement and organization of enforcement.

Something like the man in the story who jumped on his horse and rode off in all directions, the American motorist can get behind the wheel of his car and drive off in almost any direction. Roads lead everywhere and these roads are in every stage of repair and disrepair. Keeping this vast network up to date, points out the National Automobile Club, keeping this vast network capable of handling the ever increasing volume of traffic, is really quite a problem.

Thoroughly aware that this problem existed, the engineers and experts of federal and state government got their heads together as early as 1934, and started a nation-wide highway survey that has since become a permanent activity. This survey has revealed many important facts about where and when the traffic is rolling and just how intensely.

With the facts before them and road planning no longer a matter of vague speculation and personal whim, the engineers wasted little time in getting their plans down on paper. These plans call for expressways that will run under or over cross streets in the large city areas, will loop around the downtown districts to avoid congestion, and will carry as much as five times the traffic that ordinary streets will carry. They also call for the streamlining and modernizing of thousands of miles of rural roads that have been gradually becoming obsolete.

But it isn't merely a matter of having plans down on paper. Construction has been under way for many years now, more than seventy-one thousand miles of high type surface roads were built in the eleven years from 1941 to 1951 inclusive, and the huge roadbuilding industry that has been built up under the private contract system with competitive bidding is bringing the job giant scrapers and power shovels that can fill up valleys and level hills in almost a matter of days. With the latest equipment, a modern paving crew can turn out a mile of new surfacing in one working week.

All over the country new roads and new road surfaces are coming into existence. Blasting out rocks and shoving around great mountains of top soil, construction crews are bringing to the American scene a system of roads that will give ever greater efficiency to our travel, ever greater safety to our driving, and will link the remotest hamlets with the great cities.

LICENSING COURSE

A three-week course, "Examiner Records and Their Uses," will be offered by the American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators April 26 to May 14 in Evanston, Ill., for men responsible for driver licensing in their states, L. S. Harris, executive director of the AAMVA, has announced.

"Today's increased horsepower, traffic volume, and more highway problems demand a better grade of drivers," said Mr. Harris. "It is necessary to screen drivers so that only those who are qualified will be facing these problems."

Tuition scholarships for the course are given by the Farmers Insurance Group Safety Foundation of Los Angeles. The course is conducted by the Traffic Institute of Northwestern University, 1704 Judson Ave., Evanston, Ill.

"Comprehensive records which show the need for changes and which disclose the necessary research data for improved procedures are needed to improve standards in examining drivers," according to Mr. Harris.

"Examiner Records and Their Uses" is the final unit of the chief driver license examiner program which has been conducted by the Traffic Institute over a four-year period. Participants in it who have attended the three previous units will complete 400 hours of specialized college-level instruction in the administration of driver license examining. The first unit, held in March, 1951, was "Administration of Driver License Examinations." Unit III, "Selection and Training of Driver License Examiners," was conducted in May, 1953. The series will begin again in 1955.

Subjects to be covered in the unit given this spring include: analysis of operations for record purposes, reports of examinations, record and report, summaries, and annual and other special reports.

How problems are revealed and suggestions made for courses of action based on records, preparation of data for analysis, rates, percentages, charts, graphs, and tables are also covered.

The course is under the direction of Glenn V. Carmichael, assistant director of the training division of the Traffic Institute and one of the country's foremost authorities on driver license examiner training. He will be assisted by Paul C. Keller of the Institute staff who was formerly driver licensing specialist for the Utah State Department of Public Safety.

DEATH HOURSWatch out during the "death hours" —from 10 p.m. to 2 a.m.

This four hour period is listed by the San Francisco Chapter of the National Safety Council as the most hazardous for pedestrians and motorists—day in and day out—through the year.

Of the 67 traffic deaths listed here last year, 24 occurred during this four hour span, Arnold E. Archibald, Chapter president, reported. Seventeen of the victims were pedestrians, he said.

This compares with sixteen deaths (eight of them pedestrians) through the 10-hour period between 7:00 a.m. and 5:00 p.m. when foot and motor vehicle traffic is far heavier, Archibald pointed out.

"Higher speeds, reduced visibility, and reckless night-time habits combine to increase the hazards and the death rate," the safety leader said.

Archibald urged motorists and pedestrians to use "extreme care" when driving or walking during the "death hour" period. "The record here is similar to that for other cities and in most rural areas," he said. "There seems to be a universal let down in carefulness during the time when most care is needed. Motorists gain a sense of false security from the reduced flow of traffic and instead of dropping their speed below the posted limits they are inclined to get a 'heavy foot'."

The Safety Council official added: "Pedestrians forget that they cannot be seen so well at night and step in front of fast moving cars. This combination of speed, carelessness, and limited visibility leads to the unusually high death toll between 10 p.m. and 2 a.m."

BEST BEHAVIOR

California drivers last year were on their best driving behavior since 1950 according to official statistics released today by the California Highway Patrol.

There were 3,371 traffic fatalities during 1953 compared to 3,562 in 1952. Of these, 2,342 were suffered in unincorporated areas of the state while 1,029 occurred within corporate cities.

Total injuries were also below the 1952 figures with 106,427 persons injured in traffic during 1953 as compared to 110,874 in 1952, a reduction of 4,447.

The mileage death rate, based on the number of fatalities per each hundred-million miles of travel, dropped from 7.4 in 1952 to 6.6 in 1953, an all time low for California, according to available records.

BOULEVARD & BYWAY

The American automobile seems to be getting better and better and each time you buy a new model you will invariably find some change in design that makes for greater safety or greater convenience. All this improvement, points out the National Automobile Club, just doesn't happen by accident but is the result of careful research by the teams of development engineers to be found in every automotive factory.

These teams are assigned to different parts of the car. One will work with the engine, another with the transmission, another with the axle, another with the chassis, and so on. And even each team will be subdivided and the subdivisions assigned to specific parts, the chassis group, for instance, finding themselves subdivided and assigned to frame and suspension design, wheel and tire problems, springs, brakes, or steering qualities.

Once a group has been assigned to a specific part, it is asked to find out all that it possibly can about that part from every possible source. To do so they go to suppliers, to laboratory or field testing, to rival makes of cars, or to any other source they can think of.

With this background knowledge in mind they are then asked to develop ideas for the improvement of their special part. When the ideas come up they are carefully discussed and screened and the go-ahead is given for experimentation and testing. Although about four out of five of these ideas are usually doomed to failure, the senior engineers are very liberal in giving their go-ahead because they know that by some slight new twist, some slight new adjustment in design, a young engine is apt to come forth with a new development that will prove to be of great benefit to all concerned.

Ideas are tested in a dozen different ways and often over a period of many years before they are finally abandoned or come to their full fruition. And when that one-out-of-five comes through, the American motorist has another new improvement to look forward to, another added something in the way of his safety or his driving comfort.

CARE OF BRAKES

Because brakes lose efficiency in a gradual manner, it is important that they be checked regularly, the California State Automobile Association cautions. If the pedal can be depressed to a point within two inches of the floor board, it is time to visit a repair shop for readjustment.

EXPENSIVE PROPOSITION

Here's the way the money goes.

The average California family's share of traffic accident costs amounted to ten dollars per month during 1953. On a per capita basis, accidents cost each resident of the state $30,000 per year.

Total economic loss last year is placed at $320,245,000.00, according to an announcement released by the California Highway Patrol. This total is reached by multiplying $95,000, representing the average cost of one traffic fatality, by the total of 3371 fatalities suffered in traffic collisions in the state last year.

This formula allows for injury and property damage accidents as well, and includes wage losses, medical expenses and professional services, and auto repairs, costs that must be shared among all the people.

"While the loss of human life can never be reduced to terms of dollars and cents, and while there is no possible way of compensating for these tragedies, lives can be saved, painful and permanent injuries can be prevented, and millions of dollars in property damage can be prevented by defensive driving," declared B. R. Caldwell, Commissioner of the Highway Patrol.

"The economic loss in traffic accidents for 1954 has already reached a figure in excess of 50,000,000.00," he pointed out.

Caldwell suggests that every motorist approach traffic problems assuming that every other motorist is going to make a mistake.

BUNKO MEN ON HIGHWAYS

You have a nice car. It bespeaks your prosperity and you feel you are really somebody as you glide in comfort over the smooth highways. But, since the world began there is always that disturbing fly in the ointment—you notice a battered flivver keeping just a tantalizing distance ahead of you on the road. The driver of that flivver is doing an excellent job of, as they say in football, "running interference." He is your shadow, but always up front.

For your present—and perhaps your future—peace of mind there are two things you can do; Pull off to the side for a few minutes, or drive very carefully until you get past the pest. Yes—drive carefully for the pilot of the flivver may be a racketeer of a common brand of recent years.

His game is to get a larger car to crash into him, then to adroitly act his part as a poor man in a bad predicament due to your fault, and to accept a cash settlement.

BET YOUR LIFE

Any driver who gambles against the traffic laws may pay with his life if he loses.

"A review of accident reports indicates that in about 85 per cent of all traffic accidents, one or more traffic laws were violated by motorists or pedestrians, or both," declared California Highway Patrol Commissioner B. R. Caldwell.

"Too many drivers approach their duty of observing traffic laws asking themselves, 'Can I get away with this?' Then, if they think they can, they'll break the law almost every time.

"Very often they don't get away with it. They receive citations as half-a-million did on highways in unincorporated areas of California last year, or they are involved in accidents. Worst of all, they often injure or kill innocent people," he added.

Caldwell also had a word for careless pedestrians. He said that while there are few traffic laws governing pedestrian conduct, there are safety rules, and pedestrians who don't observe them are their own worst enemies.

"It is absolutely senseless," the Commissioner pointed out, "for a pedestrian to pit his weight against the weight of an automobile. The odds are all against him."

Pedestrians were especially cautioned not to cross streets in mid-block nor against red lights.

REMOVING SPOTS

Here a few of the more common upholstery spots and suggestions for getting rid of them, passed only by the National Automobile Club.

For grease and oil spots rub with clean cloth wet with carbon tetrachloride. For lipstick, apply a small amount of tetrachloride directly to the stain and immediately press a blotter on the spot. Repeat until stain is removed. Rub ice cream spots with soap suds and clean with a cloth wet with cold water. After drying, cleaning fluid may be used to eliminate any last traces.

Candy spots should be rubbed with a cloth wet with hot water. If necessary, follow by sponging the spot, after drying, with carbon tetrachloride. To remove chewing gum spots, wet with carbon tetrachloride and work gum off with a dull knife while moist. Wet fruit spots with hot water, scraping any pulp from the fabric. In an extreme case pour very hot water directly on the spot before scraping.

WATCH THOSE SIGNS

SACRAMENTO—"Do you believe in signs?" asks the California Highway Patrol of every driver using California's streets and highways.

"We ask that question because each year at least 6,000 drivers are involved in fatal and injury traffic accidents because they disregarded traffic signs and signals," B. R. Caldwell, Highway Patrol Commissioner said recently. "Probably 100 times that many drivers habitually ignore traffic signs and signals. They may escape trouble for a while but the odds are against them. Sooner or later they will ignore a sign and then tragedy strikes.

"Traffic signs are in reality signs of life and are erected with just one purpose in view, to warn motorists of hazards and dangerous situations just ahead," Caldwell continued. "Drivers who believe in these signs will obey them because they realize the possibility of an accident if they don't.

"Obedience to traffic signs means adjusting the speed of your car to the indicated conditions," the Commissioner added. "It also means making a full stop at every stop sign, never crossing a double line except when the dotted line is on your side, being extra alert at railroad crossings and when driving through construction zones, giving proper signals when turning, changing lanes or stopping and heeding the speed limit signs indicating a speed lower than 55 miles per hour. Obeying the signs of life will make your journey safer, quicker and more enjoyable."

POLICE RESERVES

Volunteers for the Auxiliary Police Reserve may apply weekdays except Saturday between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m., and Tuesdays and Thursdays from 7.30 to 9.30 p.m., at the Police Academy, Fulton Street and 37th Avenue.

A new class of Civil Defense volunteers is now forming and began training under regular departmental instructors, Tuesday evening, February 23, at 7.30 o'clock. Inspector William J. Osterloh, SFPD, training officer of the San Francisco Disaster Corps, announced.

The course, a thorough training in police work, consists of 36 sessions, which include Civil Defense indoctrination, basic criminal law and procedure, investigative techniques, and firearms practice. Though the volunteers are unpaid, all necessary equipment is issued free.

All physically fit men, over 21 years of age, not subject to military draft, are eligible to apply.

COURTESY HELPS

"Highway courtesy can materially reduce the disgraceful traffic accident, death and property damage tolls," declared California Highway Patrol Commissioner B. R. Caldwell in commenting on the nation-wide program to bring more courtesy to bear in highway travel.

"The adopted slogan, 'Make Courtesy Your Code of the Road,' is particularly good advice when common violations that cause accidents are analyzed. Discourtesy is a prominent factor in right-of-way disputes, improper and unsafe passing, illegal turns, failure to obey lights and traffic signs, and especially aggravating lane-straddling," Caldwell said. "One of the more discourteous acts noted on our streets and highways," continued the Commissioner, "is the practice of driving slower than the normal flow of traffic."

"These discourteous acts provoke other drivers, agitate the quick-tempered to retaliate, and actually increase traffic hazards. At the same time a courteous deed promotes goodwill and often inspires another driver to return the favor.

"It is indeed unfortunate that many highway users have not learned to display the same courtesy in traffic that is customarily shown guests in the home. If this were the case, highways would be much safer for everyone," he concluded.

RATTLE RELIEF

Those of us who have automobiles that "just weren't built yesterday" are inclined to accept all those miscellaneous squeaks and rattles and clunks with a stiff upper lip, deciding in our hearts that this is all an inevitable part of our ancient cars. This decision, according to the National Automobile Club, is not quite justified because there are really all sorts of things that one can do to get rid of those rattles and clunks.

Take the clunking that comes from a looseness between frame and body. You can get rid of that by tightening up a few key body bolts that tie the frame to the body. Some more banging and clunking can be cleared away by tightening up on battery containers and battery hold-down bolts and by tightening up a few attaching and assembly bolts on that front and rear bumper. For that banging that comes from springs and shackles that are just too loose, a few quick turns on the right bolts will end all that.

TROLLEY TRACKS

Avoid wet trolley tracks when driving, advises the National Automobile Club.

Pyramid Lake is a desert sea, all that remains of prehistoric Lake Lahontan, which once covered most of Nevada. The Truckee River empties into Pyramid, and there is no outlet.

The Pyramid after which Pyramid Lake is named is a huge stone formation both older and larger than the Pyramids of Egypt. It was first discovered by General Fremont's expedition in 1843, and is 400 feet high.

Anaho Island, near the Pyramid is the world's largest pelican rookery. Few sights are as impressive as a formation of these graceful birds flying along the shores of the lake.

The cui-cui, a prehistoric fish unknown elsewhere, thrives in Pyramid Lake. At one time this lake was noted for its record breaking trout, with specimens weighing more than 40 pounds.

To get to Pyramid Lake from Reno, drive east on 4th St. (Highway 40) to Alameda Avenue, (Hwy. 33). Turn left at the traffic light there. Four blocks from 4th street, you will pass the Reno Rodeo grounds. Past the rodeo grounds, follow the paved road. You will drive for approximately three miles past beautiful cottonwood trees and green irrigated fields. A sudden change to sandy areas and sagebrush marks your departure from Reno's irrigated zone. The road continues on through desert hills scarred occasionally by the prospector's pick. Old "diggins" show as white pockmarks in the brown hills, and prospectors trails can be seen leading away from the road on either side. Nine miles from Reno, on the right, you will see the Herold's Club Trap and Skeet Club, scene of major matches.

Pyramid Lake comes into view as the highway emerges from the hills. The "Pyramid" is at the far side, looking tiny in the distance. Approximately one mile to the left is the Pyramid Lake Guest Ranch, and a trading post which sells Indian craft work and beverages.

Pyramid Lake has an all-pervading atmosphere of peace and solitude. Only one or two houses are on its shores, and it's easy to feel like an explorer as you step out of your car. Sunset at Pyramid Lake is one of the most beautiful sights in the West.

Returning, turn your car and back-track. Passing the road by which you came, follow the lake shore to Nixon, Paiute Indian settlement. At Nixon, turn right on highway 34 to Wadsworth, once a main maintenance station for the Southern Pacific Railway. Turn right

CARSON CITY

Carson City, Nevada, 30 miles from Reno, is the nation's smallest state capital, with a population of approximately 5,000. Towering mountains of the Sierra Nevada, usually snow-capped, lie just outside the city limits to the west. Desert hills are on the east. North and south of Carson City are beautifully fertile fields supporting agriculture and cattle.

Nevada's state buildings line tree-shaded Carson street. The capital's huge dome may be seen from any part of the city.

At the end of the last century, the Carson City mint made silver coins from ores mined at the nearby Comstock Lode in Virginia City. The mint building, across from the V. & T. Depot is a museum and silver coins stamped with the mint's "C-C" mark are highly prized by coin collectors.

The museum has become a treasure house for the old West. Indian craftwork, historic newspaper files, ancient guns, and other relics are displayed in its halls. Mining has played such a large part in the history of Nevada that a full-size replica of a silver mine has been reconstructed in the museum's basement. Every detail of the mine was supervised by experienced mining men. Most mines refuse to admit visitors because of hazards to themselves and workmen. The Carson City Museum's mine is one of the few places where actual mining conditions may be examined in safety.

Even the state prison has historic significance. In cutting a passageway, prehistoric footprints were discovered, and carefully preserved.

Carson City's homes are fine examples of the 18th Century's best. Most of them are furnished, at least in part, in the ornate manner of Civil War days. One, the Rinckel mansion, is set up so that visitors to Carson City can go through and see the fine examples of craftsmanship that made living comfortable and luxurious for early Nevadans.

Indians whose ancestors roamed Nevada centuries ago are educated at the Stewart Indian school, just a few miles south of Carson City. The school buildings are built of natural Nevada rock in a multitude of colors. Indians from Stewart complete with students of other schools in sporting events, and usually come out high on the list.

"Virginia and Truckee" is a name well known to railroad fans. Once this railroad was one of the very richest, hauling ore from the Comstock to Reno for shipment to San Francisco. It was closed down in 1950, but one of the old engines stands near the V. & T. shops on Carson Street, and the tools once used for maintaining the custom-built locomotives are still in the shops.

Carson City would be charming if it were just another town, so beautiful is its location. As capital of the State and storehouse of Western lore it is a must for the visitor to Nevada.

SPECTACULAR TOWN

Mount Rose—Tahoe—Carson City tour is one of the most spectacular in the West. The Mt. Rose road in itself is a memorable experience, climbing from the lush Truckee meadows almost to the 8,933-foot summit of Mt. Rose, and then descending through dense evergreens to the shores of Lake Tahoe, largest lake at its altitude or higher on the North American continent.

Carson City, Nevada's capital, and the smallest in the United States, is rich in historic interest. Here are the yards of the famous Virginia and Truckee railway, which once was the richest road in the nation and has now ceased operations. The Carson City museum has a multitude of items that played their part in the development of Nevada and the West, and a full-size replica of the silver mines which made Nevada famous.

Starting at the center of Reno, drive south on highway 395 (South Virginia Street). You will pass through the wonderfully fertile Truckee meadows and at the same time be able to see desert hills to the East on your left. All the fields are irrigated by water from the Truckee River, and you will see irrigated ditches as you drive.

Nine miles from Reno, turn right on the Mount Rose road (Nevada highway 27.) You will drive through typical Nevada sagebrush and greasewood until you reach, in about 4 miles, the beginning of the evergreens. Just after entering the wooded area, you will come to Galena Creek, and the Galena Creek picnic area. Outdoor cooking facilities and pure water make this a fine place to stop.

Farther up the road, 20 miles from Reno, you will pass the Mt. Rose Bowl, site of the famous Silver Dollar Ski Derby. Topnotch skiers in the United States and abroad have tried these slopes, and liked them.

The road is steeper above the bowl, and it's wise to keep a close watch on marks on "justice" and "law" represent a typical example; also they are a literary masterpiece.

"Man has always sought justice, but has never agreed as to what it is.—Man's continuous seeking for justice has resulted in our elaborate framework of law and organization for the administration of law.—The purpose of law is to make it possible for people to live together peaceably. To live together peaceably, people must mutually respect each other's lives, property, and opinions. The law should aim to harmonize and adjust these areas of conflict and of overlapping desires and claims which arise when people live in close proximity. This should be done with as little requirement or sacrifice on the part of each as will bring about the required harmony in interaction.—Society has arranged policemen, judges, jails, probation officers, parole officers, juries, attorneys, and has set up the law which must be obeyed. This program of justice has been torn asunder by bitter criticism. No part of it has escaped, and as long as man is what he is, no program of justice can be constructed which would be satisfactory to all. Society can, however, agree upon a concept of justice, primarily by conditioning through family life, education, and precept. But if the machinery is set up by society, the individual in the society is what makes the machinery work. Justice then becomes what man makes it."

In giving a definitive opinion of Professor Dienstein's book, ARE YOU GUILTY? I can, without reservation, recommend it as an indispensable contribution. It most certainly should be made available in every library, and be required reading both for primary and advanced students as well. I heartily advocate its use and study by teachers in the class room, by peace officers (executives and subordinates alike) and, more importantly, by the public at large, since it is to the "man in the street" that we turn, in the final analysis, for aid and support in a crisis such as the present; and we do face such a crisis, as the reading of Professor Dienstein's book and a little careful reflection will discover. And in this connection, a final truism will be worth remembering; namely, justice can only be what the citizen wants it to be; the machinery of justice must afford equal protection for all, be accessible to all, and swift in operation. Only thus can Democracy hope to survive.

your engine temperature, shifting into a lower gear when it begins to rise.

Deer abound in the territory adjacent to the road. You may also see porcupines, chukar partridge, and ground squirrels if you watch closely.

Downgrade, after passing the summit, is a scenic thrill. Lake Tahoe, emerald green, blue, and dusty gray, lies beneath you like a painting, unbelievably beautiful.

Turn left at the lake shore (route 28) and drive along the lake's edge for 14 miles to Glenbrook. Turn left on highway 50, and head for Carson City on the Clear Creek grade. Wagon trains once followed this road on their way from Sacramento to Virginia City.

Turn left at the foot of the grade (10 miles from Glenbrook) on highway 395 and drive 3 miles to Carson City. You will see the old Carson City Mint, now the Nevada State Museum, the state capital, and the other state buildings right on 395.

Continue on through Washoe Valley. About 18 miles from Carson City you will see steam rising from the ground at Steamboat Springs. Continue on to Reno.

Ten miles north of Carson City is Bowers Mansion, a reminder of the first Comstock millionaires, Lemuel (Sandy) Bowers and his wife. Now owned by Washoe County, it is a recreation center with swimming pools and picnic grounds. The mansion, hidden behind formal planting of Lombardi poplars and Scotch broom is a museum.

SPEEDS BELOW FIFTY

Speeds below fifty miles per hour are said by National Automobile Club to be most economical.

NOT ONLY COST

Driving in such a manner that severe use of the brakes is necessary is costly in more ways than mere lining wear, warns the National Automobile Club. Think of the energy generated by the engine to get up to such a speed that becomes pure waste when the car has to be stopped suddenly. The motorists who drives more slowly and is able to coast to an approximately stop is the one who gets the most gasoline mileage in the course of a year.

TRAFFIC OFFICER

Cooperate with the traffic officer, advises the National Automobile Club. He is not out there to kill your fun. He is out there to keep you from killing yourself.

Vivian Avenue which reaches a dead end at the Tuolumne River on the edge of the Fairbanks district, a suburb of Modesto, California. They found Teekle and Welch waiting for them beside the car.

The officials recognized the dead man as readily as the farm hands had. Eilif Deraas was an athlete known throughout California for his prowess on skis. Born in Norway, he had developed his mastery of the sport there and come to Wisconsin during his boyhood. There he had continued to ski until he became champion of the state, a title he held for several years before coming to California. Deraas went on to new honors in the Western state, winning the ski championship of Tuolumne County in the High Sierras, and becoming known as one of the outstanding performers on the Pacific Coast.

Silently Hammett and Sovern studied the body. The lean athletic figure of the ski champion was stretched out close to the rear wheel, so close in fact that the outflung left hand showed burn marks from contact with the spinning wheel. He was wearing work clothes and a small woolen ski cap on the back of his head. Sovern removed the ski cap and studied the head. He turned to Hammett.

"It was murder all right. He was shot in the rear of the skull by a small caliber revolver. He couldn't have done it himself."

"He'd have had a hard time spinning those rear wheels and throwing dirt over himself or disposing of the gun after he was dead, too," Hammett remarked. "I wonder what the motive was?"

Further investigation revealed that the skier's blood soaked pockets contained only a package of cigarettes and a pocket comb.

"It looks like robbery," Hammett observed. "Whatever it was, this case is going to be too big for one man to handle. I'm going to call Sheriff Hogin. Better not touch anything until we get some pictures."

The deputy called Sheriff Grat M. Hogin at his home in Modesto and outlined the facts of the case briefly. Hogin immediately dispatched Chief Criminal Deputy Stanton Briggs and Deputy Sheriff John B. Moorhead. He then called District Attorney Lester Cleary who assigned a deputy, William Zeff, to the case.

Briggs and the two deputies hurried to the scene where they found Sovern, Hammett, and the two farm hands impatiently awaiting their arrival. The corpse was lying in exactly the same position as it had been when Teekle and Welch discovered it.

"I tried not to disturb anything any more than necessary," Hammett told them. "I knew you would want pictures. There should be fingerprints on that car and maybe footprints in this soft dirt."

"You haven't noticed any footprints yet?" Briggs inquired.

Hammett shook his head. "No. But I haven't looked too close. I didn't want to add mine to them and confuse the issue."

JOHN MOORHEAD

The chief deputy nodded his approval and approached the car gingerly, studying the ground carefully. He circled the entire vehicle and stopped where he had started.

"Strange," he observed. "There are footprints around the car, but they're just fragments. We couldn't get a decent cast out of any of them. And I don't see any leading away. You don't suppose the murderer flew."

Hammett grinned. "Something like that. He indicated a grassy strip about five feet from the auto that lead to the river bank and followed it indefinitely. "If the killer walked along that he wouldn't leave any decent prints. He could walk along until he reached hard ground or the road and we might never find his prints. He could have jumped from the car to the grass. It's a short enough distance."

Briggs nodded. "That's probably what he did. He must have had a good reason to be so careful about his feet."

The chief deputy set up his camera and photographed the scene from every angle before investigating further. When he was through he wrapped his handkerchief around the car door handle and opened it carefully. The upholstery was saturated with blood, but aside from the blood stains there was no indication of a struggle. Briggs noticed that there was no registration slip on the steering wheel post.

"I wonder if this car beyonged to Deraas or someone else," he remarked. "It could be somebody else's, or stolen."

"That ought to be easy enough to check on," Sovern said. "But what drew your attention to it?"

"Two things. First, the body is lying by the right side of the car, as though he got out on that side. The second is even more obvious." Briggs indicated the blood soaked upholstery. "You'll notice all the blood in the car is in the center. A little to the right, if anything. Deraas wasn't in the driver's seat when he was shot."

"That means the crime took place in this car," Zeff mused. "He could have been killed somewhere else and taken here."

"That's right," Briggs agreed. He turned to the Coroner. "Have you any estimate as to how long he has been dead?"

"About seven hours," Sovern replied. "It could vary an hour one way or another. I couldn't make it much closer."

"In other words he was murdered about one-thirty a. m. today," said Briggs. It was eight-thirty a. m. on the morning of March 16, 1936, when he spoke.

"Or twelve-thirty, or two-thirty," the Coroner answered. "I can't set the time to the minute. I'd just hinder you if I tried to."

"That's close enough," Briggs observed. "Let's see if we can find anything else here. And somebody see if there is anything around that will tell us who owns this car."

A close examination of the auto showed that a hurried attempt had been made to remove all fingerprints from the windows and other sections. The thin film of gray dust that covered the car had been wiped away in several places. In his hurry, however, the killer had neglected three clear prints on the right-and door window.

"I hope they are the murderer's," Briggs remarked. "At least we have the victim's. We got them after a tavern brawl last month, when he was arrested."

An oil change card, tied inside the hood, indicated positively that the automobile belonged to Deraas. Meanwhile, Hammett, assisting in the examination of the car, made a startling discovery.

"The turtleback has been wiped off," the deputy shouted. "What do you suppose made him do that?" There must have been something to hide."

The deputy searched further, and found what he was looking for, half concealed by the handle of the cover. There, clearly outlined against the dust, was a heelprint complete in every detail. Even the trade name, "Goodrich Wingfoot" stood out distinctly.

Three more more prints were found, all on the turtleback, but none as clear as the one beneath the door handle. The investigators noted that the heelprint was unusually small, indicating that it had been left by a woman or a very small man. Briggs set up his camera and photographed the evidence.

"I don't see why it was on the turtleback," he remarked. "It may be that the killer used it as a springboard from which he jumped to that patch of grass. Anyway, if it was a woman, the solution of this case should be simplified. Robbery as a motive would be practically eliminated."

"Perhaps there were two of them and one stood on the rear of the car and tried to rock it free while the other sat at the wheel," Hammett suggested. "The gasoline indicator shows the tank is empty."

A moment later Hoff, who had been inspecting the ground surrounding the scene, turned up evidence that substantiated Hammett's theory. He found two sets of footprints apparently belonging to a man and woman leading across the plowed field from the grassy river bank.

Leaving Hammett to watch the car, Briggs and the rest of the party set out immediately to follow the mysterious footprints, hoping they would lead to some more likely clue. Their hopes were shattered, however, when they found the trail lead to a farmhouse where the owner and his wife admitted the trail had been left by them when they returned from working on the river bank the preceding day.

The officers returned to the scene and resumed their investigation. A blood-stained copy of the Stockton Record was found in the bushes by the riverbank and taken as evidence. The paper had been sold on Friday, March 13, and was a copy of the home edition. Briggs pointed out that while it was probably of little significance, the home edition was not delivered in Stanislaus County, indicating that the paper would have had to be purchased north of the Stanislaus River in San Joaquin County.

Moorhead called attention to a deep break in the riverbank close to where the paper was found.

"He could have come here and fallen in when he attempted to wash the blood from himself," Briggs admitted. "With these rivers all at the peak of their spring flood, he could be washed clear into the San Francisco Bay before the body is found. That wouldn't help a bit. It's also possible that he came here and disposed of the murder weapon. I was counting on the bullet in Deraas skull as a valuable clue."

Satisfied that they had investigated the scene of the murder as completely as possible, the officers returned to Modesto. A check with Deraas' fingerprints there revealed that all of the seven prints found on the car belonged to the owner. Meanwhile Sovern removed the fatal bullet from the dead man's skull and reported that it was a thirty-two caliber and in good enough condition for a ballistics expert to match it with the gun from which it had been fired.

Moorhead and Hammett set out to check on the dead man's personal history for some clue that might lead to the cause of the murder. In spite of the fact that his pockets contained only the cigarettes and comb, indicating robbery, the investigators felt that the impression might have been left deliberately to cover up some less obvious motive.

Close questioning of the dead man's friends and acquaintances revealed only that Deraas had been extraordinarily uncommunicative regarding his personal life. They found only that the skier was employed in off season by a Ripon vineyard and that prior to that he had worked for the Roma Winery there. Ripon, a small town half way between the larger cities of Modesto and Manteca, could not produce a single individual who knew of any feminine acquaintances of the ski champion. Apparently he had no love affairs. What then, they wondered, was the significance of the small heel-print? Was it possible that, as the heel-print indicated, there had been a woman in the car at the time Deraas was murdered? Or had an exceptionally small man committed the crime and with robbery as his motive? In the light of their findings at Ripon the detectives leaned toward the latter theory.

One bit of evidence was uncovered in Ripon which gave added strength to the robbery motive. The deputies found two youths, Fred Gritton and Elvin Lemas, who were apparently the last two people to see Deraas alive, with the exception of the killer.

The two youths, both admirers of Deraas' ability as a ski jumper, told Hammett and Moorhead they had seen the murdered man in the Midway Service Station in Manteca at about nine o'clock the night of March 15. Earlier in the evening, they said the dead man had been drinking in a Ripon beer tavern and had stated when he left there he was going home.

A short time later the two boys saw him stop at the Midway Service Station, where a young man approached his car, spoke to him briefly, and got in. They told the officers that the rider appeared to be a hitchhiker and described him as being light complexioned, short, and attired in a light shirt, dark hat, and dark necktie. They added that he appeared to be wearing a small mustache, although they could not be sure in the bad light. They estimated his weight at about 145 pounds.

"One more thing," Moorhead asked them. "Did you notice whether or not Deraas had any money when he left you at the tavern?"

"As near as I could tell he had about twenty dollars," said Gritton. Lemas agreed that the ski champion had at least that amount.

Convinced that the man seen entering the ski champion's car was the most likely suspect, Moorhead and Hammett pressed their investigation in Ripon, hoping to discover someone who could give them a satisfactory clue as to the identity of the hitchhiker.

Wallace Sheppard, the owner of a hog ranch on the outskirts of town, provided the only other bit of information. He reported that he had been approached the night before the murder by a young man who wanted work, and had hired him for the evening to look after the hogs while he attended a moving picture. Sheppard added that he believed the man was familiar with Modesto because he had asked if the rancher was going to the Strand Theatre.

"I went to the Strand, all right," Sheppard told the officers. "But he didn't watch the hogs. When I returned from the movies he was gone, and so were fifteen dollars and a valuable camera."

"Can you describe him?"

"Only that he was young, seemed small, and had brown hair and a brown hat. I couldn't swear to the color of the hair or the hat. It was pretty dark when I talked to him," the rancher said.

"Would you recognize him if you saw him again?"

"I believe I would," Sheppard replied. In the hope that the man described by Sheppard was in the rogue's gallery at the sheriff's office, the rancher was taken there and shown scores of photographs that answered his description in a general way. Sheppard studied them all carefully but reported he did not see the man.

"That's too bad," Briggs remarked. "Our only suspect is now an anonymous hitchhiker. One of thousands on the California highways. Our only clues are a blood stained newspaper, a photograph of a size three heel print, and a thirty-two caliber slug."

Returning to the scene of the murder, Moorhead and Hammett questioned the residents of surrounding farmhouses, but could find no one who had heard the fatal shot. One farmer, John Lombardini, who lived closest to the scene of the slaying, reported that he had seen a car drive along Vivian Avenue toward the river at about eleven o'clock the night of the murder and that he had not see it return.

"That must have been Deraas," Hammett observed. "But if he picked up the hitchhiker at nine o'clock in Ripon and took a half hour to get here, that leaves an hour and a half unaccounted for. It is entirely possible that the hitchhiker had left him then and someone else was with him."

"Maybe the hitchhiker killed him somewhere else and came here to dispose of the body. That would take up some of the time," Moorhead pointed out. "Perhaps nobody heard a shot here because it was fired some other place."

Locating one murdering hitchhiker among the thousands who roam the highways and placing him in the death car at the time of the murder appeared a hopeless task, but Hogin, Briggs, and their deputies were working at it stubbornly when evidence was unearthed that threw an entirely new light on the case.

A few days after the murder the ski champion's sister, Mrs. J. P. Jorgensen of Ripon, approached Coroner Sovern. She stated flatly that she did not believe her brother was killed by a hitchhiker.

"He was killed in a row over a woman. I'm sure of it," she said.

"It would be easier to find the murderer if he had been," Sovern admitted. "But up to the present no one has been able to find any woman in his life who was more than a casual acquaintance."

"I found one," Mrs. Jorgensen told him. She drew a small package of letters from her purse. "I opened these because I thought they might contain some clue that would lead to Eilif's killer. I hated to do it, but now I'm glad I did. When you read them I think you'll have your killer."

Sovern opened one of the letters and glanced through it. The words "he'll be mad, but I don't care" caught his eye. He read several more, then picked up the telephone and called the sheriff.

"I think we can forget about the robbery motive in the Deraas case," he said. "The victim's sister is here with some letters that throw an entirely new light on the case."

"I'll be right over," the sheriff responded. A few moments later Hugin and Briggs arrived in Sovern's office and examined the letters. They were written in a fine hand and revealed a love affair that the ski champion had succeeded in keeping completely secret by his silence. The letters were signed by a Hilda Johnson, and the return address was Modesto. They indicated that she had been engaged to a young San Francisco machinist to whom she referred as Frank, for some time, but that she was going to break off the engagement because of her love for the ski champion.

"This ought to clear things up," Hugin remarked. "I guess our hitchhiker was not implicated after all. We'd better go talk to that girl."

The girl, a good looking blond young lady of Swedish descent, was nervous when the officers arrived but told her story willingly.

"I've really been expecting you," she said. "But I'm sure Frank didn't do it. He was awfully angry, but he wouldn't kill anybody."

Miss Johnson went on to tell the officers that she had been engaged to the San Francisco man for three years before meeting the ski champion. After meeting Deraas she had known that her engagement to Frank would have to be called off and was considering such action when he heard from other sources that she was going out with someone else.

Angrily he came to Modesto on March 13 and expressed his displeasure at her behavior. While he was visiting her Deraas had arrived to discuss a skiing expedition they had planned for the weekend in Yosemite Valley. The girl had talked to him outside her house and through the curtains her fiance had seen her embrace and kiss the ski champion. Seething with indignation he denounced her and told her he was through.

"I don't want anything to do with that kind of a girl," he said, and left in such a hurry he neglected to take his hat.

When the girl finished her story she reiterated that she did not believe her fiance had been responsible for the murder. She added that he had called her the day after the murder and told her he read about it in the San Francisco paper. They had decided not to say anything about the argument. When the officers insisted she gave them his name and address.

"You'd better let us decide whether or not he is the killer," Hogin told her. "People do strange things when they are in love and particularly when they have been jilted. If Frank is not guilty he'll be given every opportunity to prove it. If he is guilty he must pay the penalty."

A teletype bearing the name, address, and description of the fiancé was forwarded immediately to San Francisco, stating that he was wanted for questioning in the Deraas case. A few hours later Briggs and Deputy District Attorney Zeff appeared at the Hall of Justice in San Francisco and were told that a San Francisco Inspector was posted in the suspect's room and waiting for him to arrive. The investigators hurried to the room and joined the Inspector in his vigil.

Less than a half hour later the young man entered, smiling, and told them he had been to a movie and stopped to visit a friend on the way home.

"I hope you haven't been waiting too long," he remarked. "I suppose you've come to question me about the Deraas murder."

The officers started. He had taken them by surprise.

"What makes you think so?" Briggs demanded.

"It stands to reason that you would. Deraas was dating by girl and I broke up with her just before the murder. When I read about it I was sure you would question me, although I hoped of course you wouldn't."

The young man's frank manner and honest attitude impressed the detectives. Perhaps his former sweetheart's assumption that he could not have committed murder was correct. Zeff began questioning.

"Can you account for your movements on the night of the murder?"

The machinist nodded. He explained that he had arrived in San Francisco about five o'clock in the afternoon and played California draw poker in a public card room for an hour or so, then gone to his room. In the evening he went to a friend's house and played poker until three-thirty a. m.

"Of course we'll have to hold you until we can check that story." If it is true you have nothing to worry about," Zeff told him.

The machinist nodded amiably. "It shouldn't take long."

A careful check proved that it was impossible for the San Francisco man to have committed the murder. His story was correct in every detail and he was released promptly. Briggs and Zeff returned to Modesto empty handed.

"We're right back where we started," they told Sheriff Hogin. "I guess the hitchhiker is the man we want after all."

"Let's try Sheppard again," Hogin suggested. "There has been a wave of juvenile delinquency lately. It might be a good idea to let him see the files at Lone. The killer may have been a Preston graduate."

The officers returned to the hog rancher's home and told him of their plan. The chance of spotting the killer was a slim one, but it was a known fact that many crimes in the San Joaquin Valley were directly attributable to desperate young bandits just released from the reform school at Lone.

Sheppard consented willingly and accompanied Briggs and Hammett to the reform school. After studying a variety of photographs he picked not one, but two pictures.

"I'm sure it was one of these two boys," he told the sheriff. He indicated the photographs of Emmett C. Baldwin and Oliver Peters, both twenty-one years old and recently released from the reform reformatory.

Acting on information received from officials at Preston, Hammett accompanied Sheppard to Los Angeles where they found Baldwin living with relatives in the nearby city of Glendale. Sheppard looked at the young man and made up his mind quickly and with conviction.

"I'm sorry," he told Hammett. "That isn't the man."

While the two men returned from Los Angeles, Hogin received word that Peters had been located in San Rafael as the result of a statewide radio broadcast and teletype messages. The rancher was hustled to the northern city. Once again a quick look was all he needed.

"I guess I was mistaken. That's not the man who worked for me."

For the time being, Sheppard's value as a witness had been exhausted and he was allowed to return to his ranch. For Hammett, who returned to Modesto with him, a new duty waited.

During his absence a teletype had arrived from Sheriff George Lyle of Santa Clara County, informing Hogin that he had a likely suspect for the Deraas murder. During a hunt for a service station prowler Lyle's deputies had arrested a San Quentin ex-convict, George Kerner, and his girl friend, Nellie Carter, and were holding them for investigation.

Information revealed by Lyle's deputies indicated that Kerner had been employer recently in the Roma Winery at Ripon as a truck driver and that he had known the murdered ski champion while working there.

Further investigation lead to the discovery of a thirty-two caliber automatic together with several rounds of ammunition in the ex-con's room. The suspect was very small and had extraordinarily small feet.

Hammett and Undersheriff Harvey Wright hurried to the Santa Clara County Jail at San Jose to interrogate the suspect. Hammett produced a photograph which he handed to Sheriff Lyle.

"Before we question him, let's compare his shoe with this heel print," the deputy suggested. "I'd like to know just where we stand, before we question him."

One of the prisoner's shoes was brought to the Sheriff's office and compared to the photograph. The officers smiled. The shoe bore the "Goodrich Wingfoot" trade mark on the heel and was approximately the same size as that in the photograph.

"Of course we'll have to make more accurate tests," Wright observed. "The marks are a little different, but the shoe has been worn some. There is a good chance this is our man. There aren't many men with feet that small."

The officers called Kerner into the room and told him why they were questioning him. He paled but denied the charge emphatically. The damaging heel print was pointed out, but Kerner stubbornly refused to confess to the crime.

"I don't know whether you did it or not, George," said Lyle. "But we have your gun and we can make ballistics tests. They'll show if you killed Deraas or not."

"The sooner you make them, the better I'll like it," the prisoner replied. "I haven't been near Modesto recently. All I knew of Deraas while I was there was that he was some kind of a ski jump champion. Why should I kill him?"

"I don't know why anyone should have," Wright informed him. "But I intend to find out. Where were you when the murder was committed?"

"Hunting in the mountains behind Madera," Kerner responded.

"If you can prove it you'll be all right. All we want is the truth."

While the Modesto deputies questioned the suspect, Sheriff Lyle detailed two men to check on the prisoner's testimony. Under hours of questioning the suspect refused to break down, continuing to maintain that he was on a hunting trip over the fatal weekend. Finally he was returned to his cell to await the report of Lyle's deputies and the ballistics expert.

The deputies and ballistics report returned at almost the same time. The results obtained from both were conclusive. A thorough investigation proved that Kerner had been hunting at the time of the fatal shooting. The fatal bullets had failed to match his gun. After interviewing what seemed to be four "hot" suspects, Sheriff Hogin and his men were right where they started from the heel print, bullet, bloody newspaper and the mysterious hitchhiker.

While the days rolled in to a month, the murder of the ski star disappeared from the front pages of the newspapers. A shorter paragraph each day noted that nothing new had developed in the case.

A sports columnist turned his attention to the champion himself, telling how he had been called the finest performer ever to appear in Central California, remembering how he had twice jumped and landed erect on one ski, and recalling how he had frequently hurtled through the air with a young woman riding his skis behind him. The writer finished by remarking that it seemed a shame that so fine an athlete should die at the hand of an anonymous killer who had apparently been successful in evading justice.

The column was a challenge to Briggs. Although the investigator was faced constantly with a variety of other work, he clung stubbornly to his task, convinced that with his two vital bits of evidence, the heel print and the bullet taken from the slain skier's head, he could some day solve the crime. With grim determination he sifted Modesto for evidence, hoping only to turn up a faint trail.

Over a month after the killing his efforts were rewarded. A youthful Modesto ranch hand took him to one side.

"It sounds silly," the boy said, "but there was an ex-con in town a while back who disappeared the day after the murder. I thought it might be worth your looking into."

"Anybody who disappeared on March 16 is worth investigating," the detective told him. "What's the man's name?"

"I don't know his name," the youth admitted. "Mrs. Nelson does, though. She brought him here."

Briggs frowned. Mrs. Nelson was one of the best known women in town, a leader in church and welfare work. She was known for her philanthropic philosophy and had helped a great many unfortunate people get a fresh start in life. As the investigator approached Mrs. Nelson's home on High Street, he wondered whether her generous attitude toward the stray lambs of society had backfired.

The church leader laughed when Briggs told her of his suspicions. "William did leave town about that time," she told him. "But he couldn't hurt anyone. I'm sure he had completely reformed. Anyway, he only had one arm and he was such a little fellow. He wouldn't have been any match for a man like Mr. Deraas."

The deputy was interested. "A little fellow, you say. Tell me about him."

Mrs. Nelson told the detective how another ex-convict had told her of the man while he was still in prison and pointed out that he was particularly worthy of her help.

The convict's name was William McManus, he was twenty-eight years old and serving a five year sentence for robbery in Los Angeles. Mrs. Nelson had corresponded with him and learned that he had lost an arm after it had been crushed by a freight train nine years before in Nevada. He told her that the thing that would make him happiest at the time would be a cornet he could play in the prison band. The welfare worker responded by sending him a cornet and telling him she would try to arrange vocational training for him in Modesto.

Impressed by the convict's attitude in prison, plus the fact that he had lead a particularly hard life and was physically disabled, she arranged for his parole.

William McManus was paroled from San Quentin on Thanksgiving Day 1935 and enrolled in the Modesto Business College soon after. The disabled ex-convict was affable and had many friends. He became a regular church goer and many people in Modesto were willing to back Mrs. Nelson's belief that he was incapable of murder. They were convinced that the Los Angeles robbery was a youthful error and that he had completely reformed.

A significant fact though was that not one of these people had seen McManus since Sunday, March 15.

A check with San Quentin Authorities revealed that he had left the prison wearing size 5-5 shoes, a prison listing corresponding with the normal men's size three. The shoes were equipped with Goodrich Wingfoot heels.

"That explains why his heel print matched Kerner's," Briggs observed. "They were released from prison about the same time and both pairs of shoes came from the prison shop."

The ex-convict's room were searched and it was discovered that he had left most of his belonging's there. Missing, among other things, was the cornet. Briggs detailed Hammet to investigate Modesto music stores, thinking the missing instrument might provide some clue to the reason for the ex-convict's disappearance.

The detective located the corner at the store which Mrs. Nelson had purchased it. McManus, in selling it, had explained to the dealer that he needed money, fifteen dollars, for a pair of glasses.

When Briggs carried this information to Mrs. Nelson she reported that she had arranged for the ex-convict to get free glasses from a philanthropic society.

Meanwhile Hammett, going through McManus' possessions, found a pair of rubbers bearing the latent heel print which corresponded almost identically with the ones found on the turtleback of the death car.

Convinced that McManus was a likely suspect Hugin wrote to Clarence S. Merrill of the State Department of Criminal Identification and requested that a hold for suspicion of murder card be sent to all points with the ex-convict's record card.

As a clinching bit of evidence, Deputy John Moorhead made the rounds of Modesto pawn shops, convinced that the one armed man's secret desire for spare funds had been for the purchase of a weapon, perhaps the weapon that had ended Deaas' life.

His suspicions were proven well founded when he discovered that on March 3, the same day on which he had sold his corner, McManus had purchased a thirty-two caliber automatic. The ex-convict had signed his name as Robert Williams, but the pawn shop proprietor remembered him as a very small one armed man and the handwriting on the registration slip tallied exactly with that of McManus.

Moorhead recorded the serial number of the automatic, 103899. "If he used that gun on Deraas, we'll need it for a conviction," he remarked as he forwarded the information to Briggs.

"The gun and the heelprint are the only things we've got that can tie him up with the crime," Briggs agreed. "We'll need both of them if we capture him."

"We'll get him all right," Hugin told them. "It's just a matter of waiting now. A bad apple always turns up."

The waiting game did not last as long as the Sheriff and his deputies had expected. On the last day of April, Briggs picked up a teletype message from Clarence Merrill with vital news.

William McManus was in custody. More than that, he had picked the Oregon State Penitentiary as the safest place he could find in which to hide out from a murder charge. He was serving a ten year sentence there for an armed robbery in Vale, Oregon.

The one armed bandit had been captured just twelve days after the death of Eilif Deraas in Modesto. He had confessed to the robbery and entered a plea of guilty immediately, seeking sanctuary behind the walls of the Oregon prison.

Hogin put through a telephone call to Sheriff C. W. Glenn at Vale, Oregon.

"How was McManus armed during his robbery attempt there?" he asked.

"With a thirty-two caliber automatic," the sheriff responded.

"Have you still got it?"

"We have," Glenn told him. "What do you want to know?"

Briggs read off the number on the gun McManus had purchased in Modesto. "Check it with the gun you have," he instructed Glenn. "If it is the same, please let us know immediately?"

The numbers checked.

On May 3, almost two months after the fatal shooting, Sheriff Hogin and District Attorney Leslie Cleary faced McManus in the visiting room of the Oregon penitentiary. They had already matched the lethal bullet with McManus' gun.

"You may as well confess," Hogin told him. "We've got everything we need. Heelprint, gun, and a matching bullet. You can't win."

"How about extradition?"

"It's only a formality," Cleary told him.

"O.K., I'll confess," McManus told them. "But I shot in self-defense."

The little ex-convict told them that he had picked up a ride with the slain ski champion on the night of the killing and that Deraas had asked him to drive. Because he observed that the athlete had been drinking, McManus claimed he had consented to take the wheel.

He went on to say that Deraas had fallen asleep and awakened to accuse him of stealing the car.

"He attacked me," said McManus, "so I had to shoot him."

"Try again," said Cleary. "I don't believe you."

Once again McManus told his story, this time admitting that he shot the ski champion in cold blood with the intention of stealing the car. He told how he had wiped away the fingerprints and footprints, knowing that either would give him away.

"I forgot about the turtleback," he told Hogin. "If I hadn't you never would have caught me."

"As long as you kept the gun, we had a chance," the sheriff replied.

McManus entered a plea of guilty to first degree murder in the Stanislaus County Superior Court. Because of his confession and physical disability, District Attorney Cleary did not demand the death penalty.

On May 6, Superior Court Judge L. J. Maddux sentenced William McManus to life imprisonment in Folsom Penitentiary for the murder of Eilif Deraas.

SLAPPING PISTONS

To determine which piston or pistons are doing the slapping, points out the National Automobile Club, short out each cylinder by disconnecting the spark cable. The guilty one will show up in the decreased noise it makes. The engine of course, should be thoroughly warm for the test.

DRIVING VISIBILITY

One out of five fatal traffic accidents occurs because of poor driving visibility, points out the National Automobile Club. Rainy weather blurs your windshield and clouds the highway, so drive with special care and always try to keep your windshield clean.

OVERINFLATED TIRES

Overinflated tires cause hard riding, according to the National Automobile Club.

WHY CHANGE OIL?

Why should crankcase oil be changed? Because, points out the National Automobile Club, it breaks down after continued use under tremendous heat and because it becomes dirt and grit laden. The best way to emphasize these points is for the motorist to take a look at the dirty oil next time he has his crankcase drained. This makes a graphic and important lesson.

RATTLES

Remember that the fender guard attached to the bumpers of most cars are subject to pressures and vibration that may loosen them and cause them to rattle, points out the National Automobile Club. It is one of the many types of noise that has a way of being picked up and transmitted to another part of the car, making it difficult to locate.

YELLOW LIGHT

Running that yellow light is a dangerous practice, points out the National Automobile Club.

SQUEAK RELIEVER

You can take care of those annoying squeaks that come from the hood metal rubbing against the slick and hardened weblike material that runs around the cowl. The trick to this is simply adding a fair amount of graphite to the weblike material to make things slip about more smoothly and soundlessly. Other squeaks owing to loose brackets here and there throughout the car can be eliminated by tightening up those brackets.

Squeaking or rattling doors or windows are not much of a problem either. You can take the rattle out of the door by merely re-setting the adjustable buffer that presses the door against the lock. And you can take the rattle out of that window by merely renewing the rubber channels in which the glass slides or by adding those inexpensive anti-rattle gadgets carried in most car supply stores.

Try some of those tricks. Even though your car is ancient, you will find that you, too, can ride along in silent serenity.

TRAFFIC REGULATIONS

Wise motorists know that traffic rules and regulations and the laws of safety on which they are based operate to the motorists' advantage and that it is to their advantage to see that these rules operate. They therefore, according to the National Automobile Club, practice a great deal of self enforcement of these rules and regulations. What is your attitude towards the traffic laws and regulations? Do you practice a wise self enforcement?

REMEMBER SHOCKS

Shock absorbers, even of the most advanced design, will generate considerable heat in operation, points out the National Automobile Club. The heat, in turn will evaporate the fluid with which they are filled. It is one of those natural laws that science has not been able to overcome so the wise motorists will remember that and have the fluid level checked periodically, at least every ten thousand miles.

CARBON MONOXIDE

Tests have shown that an automobile following another closely in heavy traffic can pick up enough carbon monoxide from the exhaust of the first vehicle to have its distinct physical effect upon the following driver, reports the National Automobile Club. It is something to keep in mind if you find yourself suddenly inclined to drowsiness when driving in unduly heavy traffic.

TRUCK OWNERS KNOW

Truck tires naturally come at higher prices than those for passenger cars, points out the National Automobile Club. Wheel wobble due to bearing wear or wear in other parts makes tires wear out more rapidly. Because the penalty attached costs considerable money, truck operators guard against it. In their policy there is an excellent lesson for the owner of the passenger cars.

NEW CAR PURCHASE

Even before one goes forth in search of a new car, one should make up one's mind regarding the body style that most nearly fits one's needs, advises the National Automobile Club. With so many types available today, this is more difficult, but the careful buyer will have made a thorough study of his needs and determined which type meets them adequately before he starts his shopping trip. A mistake in this case is too expensive. A little thought will prevent errors.

MOVING FROM CURB

When you move out from the curb, move out with caution, advises the National Automobile Club. Wait for an opening in the stream of traffic, and signal your intention clearly. This is the course of common courtesy, and of common sense.

TAKE CORNERS SLOWLY

Go around those corners slowly, advises the National Automobile Club. Squeezing around corners at high speeds will scrape miles off your tires.

RAILROAD CROSSINGS

It takes enormous braking power and a considerable distance to bring a long passenger train or a fast freight to a stop. That is why, according to the National Automobile Club, the wise motorist always treats railroad crossings with a great deal of respect. He comes to a full stop and takes a good look up and down the tracks before venturing over. He's careful at the crossings, and he doesn't get himself killed.

HAND SIGNALS

Hand signals are a modern motoring must, reports the National Automobile Club.

oners. Its use has expanded to searching for lost parties and crashed airplanes and at times for helping to combat forest fires. From his plane Lieutenant Heck can skillfully guide the ground parties by walkie-talkie to plane communication.

When you consider the great contributions this flying service can make to a department, it is hard to realize that six years ago such a service did not knowingly exist in the country.

WORTH REMEMBERING

The fact that the oil level shows full on the gauge does not mean always that the crankcase is full of oil, points out the National Automobile Club. It may be that part of the supply is made up of gasoline seeped down from the cylinders where it never was burned. Crankcase ventilation takes care of this to a great extent, but in the case of a car with badly fitting piston rings, the burden may be too heavy.

DON'T RUN

If you wear rubber overshoes, don't run near traffic during rainy weather, advises the National Automobile Club. Rubber overshoes, like smooth tires, will slip easily on wet pavements, and a slip near traffic can be fatal.

EMERGENCY AID

Pushing another car, which has displaced towing it in many an emergency, is not harmful to the mechanism of the vehicle doing the pushing if it is driven carefully, points out the National Automobile Club. Clutch and tires, the common sufferers, are not damaged if they are given a chance to take on the extra load gradually. It involves starting gently and picking up speed slowly and evenly.

LOCK MUST LOCK

That cotter pin that locks the nut on the wheel must really lock it, points out the National Automobile Club. If the pin is broken when removed, it is not safe to try to use it, or what is left of it, again. A new pin costs but a few cents and is worth its weight in gold from a safety standpoint.

KEEP SUPPLY NORMAL

If provision is made for carrying spare headlight fuses, the supply should be replenished as rapidly as the spares are used, advises the National Automobile Club. The supply, otherwise, may become exhausted just at the wrong time.

CHIEF CATO RETIRES

Chief E. Raymond Cato, commanding officer, Division of Field Operations and a member of the California Highway Patrol for the past 23 years, announced his retirement from active duty on March 31. His action brings to a close an active enforcement career which spans more than 43 years.

Legislation abolishing the position of Chief of the California Highway Patrol is now before the Governor for his signature and the job will be filled in the future by an Assistant Commissioner. B. R. Caldwell, Patrol Commissioner has named Fred J. Bly, Supervising Traffic Inspector and veteran of 29 years of patrol work, as the acting Commanding Officer of Field Operations.

Cato came to the Highway Patrol at the invitation of the late Governor James Rolph, Jr., leaving the Los Angeles Police Department where he was Captain of Detectives, to take command on January 6, 1931. Though he reported on a loan arrangement, he has served as Chief continuously since that time.

On March 10, he celebrated his 65th birthday and at the same time reached compulsory retirement age for a member of the Highway Patrol.

Cato first entered enforcement work as a patrolman with the Los Angeles Police Department on September 26, 1910. He advanced through the ranks and was number three on the list for Chief of Police when he came to Sacramento to succeed Eugene Biscailuz, then Superintendent of the Highway Patrol, now Sheriff of Los Angeles County.

When he arrived in Sacramento, Cato found a statewide force of fewer than 350 officers. At the present time total patrol strength is 1526 uniformed members and 571 civilian employees. Recent legislative action has approved an increase of 220 members of the patrol which will bring total strength, members and employees, to 2317.

Reflecting on his 23 years of patrol service, Chief Cato recalls four news-making events that stand out as major accomplishments by the patrol in trouble-free handling of traffic. These occasions were the disastrous Montrose flood of 1943, the Long Beach earthquake of 1933, the first mooring of the Airship Macon at what is now Moffett Field, and the opening of the San Francisco-Oakland Bay Bridge in 1936.

During Cato's tenure as Chief, the California Highway Patrol aided in the establishment of state patrols in Arizona, Idaho, Montana and Wyoming.

Having seen the California Highway Patrol gain recognition as the foremost state traffic enforcement organization in the United States, Cato now intends to "loaf and have some fun."

A retirement dinner is being planned to be held in Governor's Hall, Sacramento on April 28. On May 13, the Chief and Mrs. Louise Cato are embarking on a trip to the Hawaiian Islands.

"We want to loaf and have some fun, so we're buying one-way tickets," the Chief declared.

CHECK THOSE TABS

Upon receipt of information that current registration renewals for the year 1954 are practically complete, Commissioner B. R. Caldwell of the California Highway Patrol has announced that the patrol will immediately step up enforcement of those sections of the Vehicle Code relating to proper registration of motor vehicles.

Motorists are reminded that the one red tab for 1954 is to be securely attached to the rear license plate. Under no circumstances is the front plate to be removed, though all drivers are requested to dispose of the 1953 license tab.

Attention of all vehicle operators is also directed to the provision of the code which requires the registration certificate to be displayed in a manner that makes the name and address of the registered owner plainly visible and legible from outside the vehicle.

OUT OF NOWHERE

The common remark after every traffic mishap is, "I didn't see the other car," or, if a pedestrian is involved, "He (or she) just appeared out of nowhere." It's easy to be taken unawares when you day-dream while driving, so always be doubly alert at the wheel, advises the California State Automobile Association. Vehicles and people don't just pop into existence in front of you unless your mind has been drifting out of time and space.

KEEP WINDOW OPEN

Even in cold weather, it pays to keep a window of your automobile open, says the California State Automobile Association, which points out that good ventilation at all times is the only assurance against dangerous carbon monoxide from exhaust fumes accumulating in your car. These fumes need not necessarily come from your own automobile; they may be sucked into your ventilation system from other cars ahead of you.

Always At Your Service

"then the dragon came. 🐉"

Nobody tells a story like Daddy. The everyday world fades away as his words lead you into a new and shining land.

And what if the Dragon is a bit scary? You need only climb into Daddy's arms to be safe and secure again before it's time to sleep.

To make those we love safe and secure is the very core of homemaking. It is a privilege known only in a country such as ours, where men and women are free to work for it.

And taking care of our own is also the way we best take care of our country. For the strength of America is simply the strength of one secure home touching that of another.

Saving for security is easy! Read every word—now!

If you've tried to save and failed, chances are it was because you didn't have a plan. Well, here's a savings system that really works—the Payroll Savings Plan for investing in U.S. Savings Bonds. This is all you do. Go to your company's pay office, choose the amount you want to save—a couple of dollars a payday, or as much as you wish. That money will be set aside for you before you even draw your pay.

And automatically invested in Series "E" U.S. Savings Bonds which are turned over to you.

If you can save only $3.75 a week on the Plan, in 9 years and 8 months you will have $2,137.30.

United States Series "E" Savings Bonds earn interest at an average of 3% per year, compounded semiannually, when held to maturity! And they can go on earning interest for as long as 19 years and 8 months if you wish, giving you a return of 80% on your original investment!

Eight million working men and women are building their security with the Payroll Savings Plan. For your sake, and your family's, too, how about signing up today? If you are self-employed, ask your banker about the Bond-A-Month Plan.

SAFETY DIVIDENDS

Accident prevention programs paid additional dividends for 15 San Francisco truck fleets and 13 industrial or business firms, when they were presented winning awards in the Inter-Fleet and Inter-Plant safety contents, conducted by the local Chapter of the National Safety Council.

The presentation took place at a luncheon held at the Marines Club before more than 150 representatives of winning or participating firms and school and public officials. Safety Council awards also were presented to 13 San Francisco schools for "outstanding" school shop safety records.

Public service awards for "exceptional service to safety" were presented by Iver C. Larson, Safety Council manager, to Radio Station KYA and to the Dwight-Edwards Company. KYA's popular "Car-Tunes" program, broadcast daily from the Bay Bridge plaza by Bert Winn, brought that station the coveted award for the second successive year. The Dwight-Edwards Company received the award in recognition of their 80-station safety contest which produced the winning slogan: "If you care to keep driving keep driving with care."

Fleet contest division winners received their awards from Paul J. Fanning, director, Bureau of Personnel and Safety, San Francisco Public Utilities Commission. Dr. O. D. Adams, assistant superintendent of schools, presented the shop safety awards to the principals or representatives of the winning schools. L. Jack Block, director of the Safety Council presented awards to the winners in the industrial contest.

Northern California "Drivers of the Month:" Andrew Brunner, General Petroleum Company; David E. Smith, Municipal Railway; Herman L. Cologne, Municipal Railway, received awards for "exceptional safety services above and beyond the call of duty." These awards were presented by Miss Yvonne Martin, the Green Cross Lady.

Firms winning their divisional competition in the 44-company Inter-Fleet Contest were: Foster Lunch System, bakeries; San Francisco Brewing Company, bottling and beverages; Planter's Nut & Chocolate Company, foods; Market Street Van & Storage Company, city trucking; J. H. Wiley, The Furniture Man, department and retail store delivery; Le Grande Laundry Company, laundry and cleaning (large fleet)—Thomas-Allec Cleaners and Dyers (small fleet); Bethlehem Pacific Coast Steel Corporation, Shipbuilding Div. (large fleet)—Fleishhacker Paper Box Company (small fleet); Union Oil Company, petroleum; Safeway Stores, Inc., inter-city trucking; The Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company, public utilities; and also for the passenger car division, (large fleet); Bethlehem Pacific Coast Steel Corporation, Shipbuilding Div., passenger cars (small fleet); and The Gray Line, Inc., public passenger carriers. "No-accident" honors were won by St. Francis Pie Shop and Mme. Ferran, Mme. Plegat & Company—placed second in their divisions on a mileage traveled basis.

Winning industrial firms in the 61-company Inter-Plant Contest were: Mullen Manufacturing Co., construction; Schenley Industries, Inc., Wine Div., beverages; E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., Inc., chemical & mineral products; Fraser & Johnston Co., heating, plumbing and air conditioner contractors; St. Francis Pie Shop, foods; California Press Manufacturing Co., heavy duty machinery and equipment; Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co.-Morck Brush

Div., textiles; H. R. Basford Co., electrical equipment; Kortick Manufacturing Co., metal products; Schmidt Lithograph Co., paper products and printing; J. H. Wiley, The Furniture Man, retail stores; and The Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co., public utilities and the office personnel section of that division.

PEDESTRIAN RIGHT-OF-WAY

Violation of the pedestrian right-of-way in crosswalks or at signalized intersections here, caused the deaths of seven pedestrians and injured nearly 300 others up to May 1, the San Francisco Chapter of the National Safety Council reported today.

Iver C. Larson, executive vice president of the Chapter, charged that "lack of knowledge on the part of motorists about the pedestrian right-of-way law seems to be a leading factor in the high accident rate due to this violation."

Larson warned drivers to observe the following State traffic laws to avoid a serious right-of-way accident involving a pedestrian:

1. The driver of a vehicle must yield the right-of-way to a pedestrian crossing the street or highway within any marked or unmarked crosswalk at an intersection, except where the traffic movement is being regulated by an officer or by traffic control signals. And at all times the motorist must exercise proper caution for safety of the pedestrian.

2. In turning a corner at an intersection controlled by traffic signals the driver must yield the right-of-way to pedestrians crossing with the green light.

Any driver who fails to observe the above regulations and fatally injures a pedestrian may face a manslaughter charge in addition to a costly law suit, Larson pointed out.

AIR SQUADRON

Not only does Sheriff Don Cox have at his disposal his full contingent of paid deputies and his colorful and well-known mounted posse, but he also has one of the west's most active air squadrons.

Boasting a membership of 48 fliers, 30 of whom own their own airplanes, the squadron was created about 14 years ago.

The Sacramento squadron is one of the most active members of the Western States Association of Sheriffs Air Squadrons, which includes between 30 and 40 fling groups in California and other units in Nevada, Arizona and Oregon.

The purposes of the organization are to have ready a volunteer flying force is in accordance with an agreement between the members and the command.

All of the airplanes in the Sacramento squadron are equipped with two way radios. Some even have ship to ship communication facilities. The smallest planes are two passenger models. The larger carry five and six passengers.

SACRAMENTO SHERIFF'S OFFICE AIR SQUADRON

The late Tex Rankin, one of the nation's foremost stunt fliers, was the inspirational spark which led to the creation of the Sacramento County Sheriffs Aero Squadron. He was a member of the Los Angeles County Sheriffs Aero Squadron.

Since its creation the Sacramento unit has been instrumental in the organization of sister squadrons in San Francisco, Monterey and Butte Counties. It also assisted the Fresno squadron in organizing the California Association of Sheriffs Squadrons.

which can be used in national or local disasters; to search for downed or lost aircraft or for persons who are lost or in distress in desert or mountain areas; to assist in policing the air under the state air navigation act; to cooperate with the federal authorities in the enforcement of safety regulations and to foster and promote civilian aeronautics.

In an emergency, the aircraft belonging to the members can be taken over for use by the Air Defense Command. This

An annual function of the group is a goodwill flight in which the Sacramento Chamber of Commerce Aviation Committee participates. This flight includes stops in various cities, both within the limits of California and in neighboring states.

The activities of the squadron were disrupted only once. That was during World War II when nearly all of the unit's members were enlisted in wartime flying activities.

COX ADDS JUVENILE DIVISION

A significant step forward in the battle against juvenile delinquency in Sacramento County was taken by Sheriff Don Cox when he named Lieutenant Robert Thomas and Deputy Herbert M. Anderson as full time juvenile officers.

This action, taken last October, marks the first time the Sacramento County Sheriff's Office has officers whose sole responsibilities lay in the field of juvenile crime.

Thomas, who has been with the sheriff's office six years, formerly was with the identification department. Anderson, a patrolman prior to assuming his new duties, has been with the office about three and a half years.

Both handled some juvenile cases before taking over their new assignment but their experience naturally was limited. This seeming lack of experience, however, is belied by the record they have amassed in the short six months since the formation of the juvenile department.

Thomas and Anderson have been responsible for more than 100 arrests in the course of clearing over 300 cases reported to the sheriff's office. This includes not only juvenile crimes but crimes committed against juveniles by adults.

The department, new as it is, has proven itself as valuable to the sheriff's office as two way radios.

One reason Thomas and Anderson have keen insight into the workings of juvenile minds may lie in the fact both are fathers, though their children are a bit young to be considered juveniles; Thomas' son is 14 months old and Anderson has two children, a son, 2½, and a daughter, 1.

The board of supervisors authorized the formation of the juvenile division after Don Cox convinced them such a unit was sorely needed to cope with delinquency in the county.

Cox pointed out the county's growth in population was not limited to adults. Juveniles were assuming an ever increasing importance in crime and specialized men were needed to keep check on youngsters who otherwise might escape detection for years until they committed a major crime.

G. A. KAMINSKY DIES

George A. Kaminsky, Sr., a well-known Sacramento police officer and brother of former Chief Fritz Kaminsky, died recently.

He was 61 and had been ill for about two years. He was appointed to the Sacramento force January 18, 1923, and retired March 26, 1947.

Most of his police service was on the narcotics detail in the detective bureau and as a patrolman in the tough West End of town. As a young man Kaminsky played semi professional baseball in the old Sacramento Valley League and after joining the department he was an infielder on the police team for 20 years.

His son, George A., Jr., is a member of the police department.

AVOIDS WEAR

Some motorists may scoff at the necessity for frequent oil changes, points out the National Automobile Club, but it is a case of he who laughs first pays finally. The only preventive of worn cylinder walls is a lubricant with good body.

EMERGENCY POLICE

Approximately 150 men are registered for emergency police service in Sacramento.

They are members of the auxiliary police unit of the Sacramento Civil Defense and Disaster Corps. Nearly 50 men have received certificates for completion of a training program and the balance are in different stages of training.

Police Captain Walter F. Sked is in charge of the trainees. He is assisted by the regular instructors at the police academy and by outside authorities on radiological defense, highway patrol service, criminal identification and allied subjects.

SCISSORS TREATMENT

Butch haircuts recently became vogue in the juvenile hall in Sacramento.

Four youths wearing long, scalled ducktail hairdos underwent the scissors treatment at the order of Police Chief James V. Hicks.

The chief labeled the pachuco hair style a trade mark of the hoodlum element and ordered that delinquents having their hair cut in that fashion would be subject to a free clipping.

He pointed out his order had a two-fold purpose. First it was a health and safety measure. Secondly, Hicks said he hoped it would do away with the practice of groups in adopting hairdos as a badge or mark.

"We find that more and more of the youths we pick up as delinquents wear their hair in this style," he noted.

The first youth who received a quick trim was arrested in connection with an attack on another boy. The three other boys were taken into custody for their part in the abduction of a 13-year-old girl.

as members during a ceremony which followed a dinner in Danisio's Restaurant.

The officers of the new chapter are: Edwina Helzer of the state bureau of criminal identification and investigation, president; Gertrude Patterson of the Sacramento County Sheriff's Office, vice president; Truly Knox Shuey of the San Francisco District Attorney's Office, secretary-treasurer, and Mary Mills of the Sacramento County Sheriff's Office, sergeant at arms.

Other members include: Virginia M. Albert, Gretchen Elizabeth Barbeiro, Nancy Lee Bland, Lena Bannucci, Lorraine June Gorman, Mildred Lucille at the meeting. Anson H. Crutcher, deputy to Board of Equalization member Paul Leake and president of the Grand Chapter, also took part. Crutcher is a former chief of the State Police.

The new unit is known as Theta Chapter and is the eighth of the Lambda Alpha Epsilon Fraternities. Other chapters are in Oakland, San Jose, the University of California at Berkeley and Los Angeles, San Francisco and Muncie, Indiana.

To qualify for admission, applicants must be students of criminology, regular police officers with police science training or instructors in police science.

The total number of fishing licenses issued by all the states in 1954 was 17,652,478; the total for California was 1,158,465, of which 15,428 were issued to non-residents.

Only two other states came near this mark—Michigan, with 1,146,387, and Wisconsin, with 1,011,813.

For their licenses in this state, Californians and visitors paid $3,476,705, nearly a tenth of the total of $35,602,903 in anglers' fees collected by all 48 states.

Minnesota was second in fishing license fees with a total of $2,283,216 and Michigan was third with $2,218,908.

CIVILIAN DEPUTIES

Sheriff Don Cox's policy of keeping his office prepared to meet any emergency is typified in the Sheriff's Reserve, an organization set up to train civilians in law enforcement work.

Fifty-three certificates recently were presented to men who had successfully completed a 72-hour course of training under the direction of Lieutenant Robert Thomas of the sheriff's office.

This training, which covered such fields as rules of evidence, the penal code, laws of arrest, patrol duties and collection of identification for preservation as evidence, was designed to give those taking the course a complete background in all phases of law enforcement so they would be ready in the event of an emergency.

Businessmen, lawyers, laborers, school teachers, salesmen and doctors were included among those who received certificates at the end of the course.

The program was the second to be given by the sheriff's office; the first was in 1951.

RAUSCHERT NOW DDA

Robert R. Rauschert, a longtime member of the Sacramento Police Department, has taken up a new job and a new career as a lawyer.

A member of the department for 14 years, Rauschert recently took a leave of absence and joined the criminal division of District Attorney J. Francis O'Shea's office as a deputy.

During most of his police career Rauschert was a detective. He handled the major crime and other details and two years ago was assigned as liaison man between the police department and the district attorney's office replacing Otis Feil who was promoted to a sergeantcy.

In his spare time Rauschert studied law at McGeorge College of Law in Sacramento and was admitted to practice last July.

The City Civil Service Board, incidentally, paid a high compliment to Rauschert in granting him a year's leave. Granting a man a leave to take another job is almost unheard of. But Rauschert had the strong backing of Chief of Police James V. Hicks, who pointed out to the board Rauschert would be gaining invaluable experience which would help him considerably if he decides to return to police work.

MONSON HEADS DEPUTIES

Monrad Monson, a veteran member of Sheriff Don Cox's staff, is the new president of the Sacramento County Deputy Sheriffs Association.

He was elected recently to succeed Edward Bristo.

Other officers are: David Mason, vice president; Harold Guerin, secretary-treasurer; Ray Lagomarsino, sergeant at arms. The members of the board of directors are: William DeLaMater, Lagomarsino, Leighton L. Littlejohn, Tom Howard Ray Peppers, Eugene Lant and Herbert Anderson.

THE SAN FRANCISCO MATCHES

The opening matches for 1954 at the S. F. Police range on Sunday started off with a hoop-de-doodle record crowd of 195 shooters which gave the range personnel a real workout and made the shooters quite late in getting home to do too well but he had a lot of fun. And while speaking of Phil I must say that last year he established a new world's NRA record for the 30-06 big bore rifle at 600 yards and the record still stands. As for me I could never get in that match as it's about all I can do to see the target at 50 yards, let alone 600 of 'em!!

And wonders will never cease. The Oakland Police Department finally broke down and actually detailed their team to the matches and the boys were so shocked over the gesture they fell apart and finished seventh in the team matches.

The bulletin board was literally covered with "for sale" signs and one even mother and the family. The day was just made for shooting and the gang was really on the ball all day long. And where did that gang of new shooters come from??? Holy smoke, there were around 40 of 'em and from all the states west from Washington to Montana. One of the boys was Phil Judd from Butte, Montana who dropped in after being away for about three years. Y'see, Phil is in the sporting goods sales business and has been trying to synchronize his western trips with some of the matches out this way and this was the first time he made connections. Phil sez he didn't

It's really funny to watch how a group of shooters grow, then fade and grow again and finally round out into a real club of shooters. To take a horrible example let's look at the bunch from Sacramento headed by Les Narvaze. For years they have had a doctor on their staff and a dentist so last week they blossomed out with an attorney to get them out of scrapes, no doubt, and were smiling all over the joint that they had a swell club. A shooting club should do just that—shoot! Now if they are real smart they will get an instructor to teach 'em.

included a dog. Yes, sir, a dog but for why is one of those questions that go unanswered.

The Burlingame Police force is doing their darndest to get themselves a pistol range so last month Sgt. Sheehan and Al Lena promoted a dance to raise funds for their venture. The affair was held at Bob's on the highway with over 300 in attendance and about a thousand dollars worth of tickets sold—and that there is quite some frog-skins. By the way, Al

TRAFFIC DEATHS DROP

Traffic Captain Patrick J. Bennett points with pride to reductions in the death, injury and accidents rates in Sacramento during 1953.

There were 15 deaths, a decrease of 21 per cent over the previous year; 1,481 injuries, a decrease of 5.5 per cent, and 4,776 accidents, a reduction of 10 per cent.

"National Safety Council recognition has proven this fact. Sacramento's Safety record for the year 1953 is more outstanding than in previous years. This is the first time in nine years that through increased safety efforts the property

It was about 8 o'clock on a cloudy March morning when Hicks and 30 of his men lined up at one end of the airfield and started their march to the other side. Shotguns blasted and one by one

He noted there are approximately 90,-000 automobiles registered within the city limits. This is approximately one car to every 1.6 persons, a higher registration rate per capita than in any other city in the country.

Commented Bennett:

"These figures, I believe, will indicate that Sacramento is doing a splendid job. The city's traffic safety record in the past damage, injury and fatal accidents have been decreased."

In true dragnet fashion, the Sacramento police, led by Chief James V. Hicks, opened war on the municipal airport's jackrabbit population awhile back and did away with more than 200 of the long eared animals.

The purpose of Operation Jackrabbit was to clear the airport runways of most, jackrabbits toppled head over heels in the tall grass at the sides of the runways.

There was an air of merriment among the officers, clad in old hunting clothes, but they were deadly serious in the bull-eye department. Very few rabbits which got in range of the sharpshooters got away.

EXPANDING CITY

The thriving City of Sunnyvale is a city of homes, gardens and factories. It is also a city of active civic leaders and community boosters, whose efforts are in no small measure responsible for Sunnyvale's remarkable growth.

It is a city of enthusiastic, energetic personalities, the full listing of which is impossible in the space of one article.

ing as secretary of the Chamber of Commerce, and holding office in many clubs and associations.

"I might as well keep going as long as I can," is her philosophy.

Another of the more prominent persons in Sunnyvale is Henry W. Lloyd, plant manager at Bowser, Inc., manufacturer of gasoline pumps.

Sunnyvale will soon have a new medical center through efforts of Dr. Howard G. Diesner, who has practiced medicine in Sunnyvale about 20 years. He received his doctor of medicine degree from the University of Illinois and went to Southern Pacific Hospital in San Francisco for his internship.

SUNNYVALE PUBLIC SAFETY HEADQUARTERS

Those personalities, selected at random by a wandering reporter, leaders as Mrs. Edwina Benner, who makes her home at 321 Frances St. She holds the distinction of being the first woman Mayor in the State of California. She held that office in Sunnyvale twice in 1924 and again in 1938. She came here in 1907 and became office manager for Libby McNeill & Libby cannery in 1920, holding that job until 1940.

She is now semi-retired after holding various public offices, heading the local OPA office during World War II, serv-

Lloyd, a native of Los Angeles, came to Sunnyvale about seven years ago. He lives at 530 Yosemite Ave., Mountain View, with his wife, teen-age daughter, and two dachshunds.

In addition to his job as plant manager, he is West Coast controller for his firm. Lloyd is a member of the executive board of the Santa Clara County Council, Boy Scouts of America, Sunnyvale district chairman for the Scouts.

He is also past president and a member of the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce and past president of the Sunnyvale Rotary Club.

He was a resident physician at Santa Clara County Hospital for two more years before coming here. He built the present medical center at 352 S. Murphy Ave. in 1947, but it has now been outgrown. Bids will be opened in about two weeks on a new medical center, to accommodate six doctors when completed and 12 doctors eventually. It will be located at Carroll St. and Old San Francisco Highway.

Dr. Diesner is another past president of the Sunnyvale Rotary Club, has been

Blackmore Serves Quarter Century

As of today the San Jose Police Department is made up of 133 men and women under the general supervision of Chief J. Raymond Blackmore who recently wound up his 25th year as a member of the force.

From Blackmore's general command, the authority necessary for efficient operation descends in a manner patterned closely after the military.

Assistant Chief Joel Carter, serving his 28th year with the department, acts as chief in the absence of Blackmore. At other times, he is charged with responsibility of keeping books pertaining to prisoners' personal property and bail, scheduling court appearances of arrested persons, and seeing that they get to court according to these schedules. He also maintains work schedules for men who patrol the city's beats.

In these duties and a host of others, Carter is assisted by Donald DeMers, the department's inspector of operations, who is specifically charged with overall training in the organization, maintaining police manual, and general disciplinary matters.

The detective bureau, which follows up investigation of criminal matters, is directed by Chief of Detectives Barton L. Collins. Also under his direction is the juvenile department which takes cases involving minors. Only a small number of cases processed each month by this unit are of a criminal nature and the greater part of these are settled without court action.

Capt. Melvin Hornbeck heads traffic law enforcement and accident investigation. Hornbeck's efforts can be best described as an unending effort to keep death off San Jose's streets.

In the Bureau of Identification, Kenneth Jordan superintends operations. He has an assistant, Peter DeLuca, and five identification officers, all women. This department is responsible for photographing and fingerprinting all persons arrested. Fingerprints must be classified and filed for future reference and made available for other police agencies throughout the nation.

Capt. Arthur Philpot is the city's traffic analyst. His department collects facts concerning traffic movement and studies how to keep it moving swiftly and safely through the streets.

Next there is Sgt. Edward Pracna, who supervises the activities of 200 volunteers who make up the auxiliary police.

Capt. Thomas Short, a veteran of 34 years in the department, is in charge of the desk and street sergeants and 91 uniformed patrolmen. His hours of duty are in the late afternoon and night when patrol activity is of the greatest importance.

In San Jose 25 men take shifts to roam the streets in automobiles and on two- and three-wheeled motorcycles. Sometimes these gents make you very unhappy indeed but they strictly enforce traffic laws to an important end—that of keeping you alive.

San Jose's traffic police are under the direction of Capt. Melvin Hornbeck who has three sergeants, Joseph S. Azzarello, Ernest Anderson and Seymour Wakeman.

Azzarello is in charge of the patrol work while Anderson's and Wakeman's duties are confined largely to follow-up investigations. The latter two try to determine whether illegal acts have been contributing factors in accidents, or they compile evidence for prosecution if it must be obtained.

Six patrolmen work in radio cars. They investigate accidents and make reports immediately after the crashes occur.

It's unlikely wives can keep their husbands from finding out how they got that banged-up fender because there will be a couple of those lads at the scene of the accident before the dust settles. Invariably, they will just ask for the facts, ma'am, just the facts—including age.

The men who may ask those questions in a quiet way are Fred Hoffman, Louis Haller, John Mattern, Floyd Kuehnis, Charles Cardona and Nal North.

Those who may bring sadness to your heart by putting expensive numbers on a slip of paper to take to the judge after you have been slipping along about 50 miles an hour in a 25-mile zone or dashing merrily through a red light or a stop sign may be William Maddox or William Campbell, Robert Sims, Ernest Barozzi, Roy Gerringer, Mario Stefanini, Joseph B. Vittoe, Thomas O'Connell, Olin Bowden, Dwight Salisbury, Edward Amaral, Walter Emory, Gilbert Cardoza, Thomas Kinney, Keith Melton, Ray Gray or Merlin Wheatley.

Some of these lads spend a good bit of their time riding around the village on three-wheeled motorcycles slapping yellow tags on cars which have been parked longer than the meter says they should or longer than you thought they HAD been.

But, all in all, ticket or no ticket, the traffic boys are just trying to keep you alive and well and they are doing a good job.

OVERINFLATE

Is it better to overinflate or underinflate automobile tires? All engineers according to the National Automobile Club, are emphatic on the point: overinflation is much to be preferred.

OLD TOWN—NEW FACES

MOUNTAIN VIEW — Selecting persons typifying the community and civic leadership of Mountain View is like dropping 100 or 200 names in a hat and then drawing a few of them.

FOOTHILL CITIES

Los Gatos, nestled in the foothills of the West Valley, is home to many people who have had interesting careers, military experiences and business prominence. Here are but a few of the people who are well-acquainted with the town because they come in daily contact with its inhabitants.

Everyone knows Ed Soderberg, the secretary-manager of the Los Gatos Chamber of Commerce. Soderberg — mustached, friendly and “one of the better-dressed men in Los Gatos”—is in his second year at the Main St. chamber office. He's got his wife on the job, too. Mrs. Soderberg was hired as C of C receptionist in April.

Mr. Secretary-Manager is a former newspaper reporter, editor and publisher. He came to Los Gatos in 1950 and his first role here was manager of the local theater.

The Soderbergs live at 54 Mullen Ave. They have two married daughters and don't deny they're grandparents.

Prentiss Brown doesn't work for the Chamber of Commerce but he says, after 23 years in Los Gatos he wouldn't work anyplace else. Brown, in the field of education for 30 years, came to Los Gatos Union High School as principal and district superintendent and he's got the same job today.

“This is a pleasant place to work—the young people come from fine homes and we receive splendid co-operation from parents,” he says.

Before coming to Los Gatos, Brown was superintendent in Baker, Ore.

After receiving his bachelor of arts degree from University of Oregon, Brown came to Stanford University for graduate work. That was during the depression and he says when the Los Gatos high school job opened up he grabbed it—and he's not sorry.

The superintendent has been instrumental in the planning of high school expansion. He and his wife live at 16730 Magneson Loop. They have two daughters, one a teacher in Stockton High School.

Mrs. Martin Fremont of 443 No. Santa Cruz Ave. thinks a woman gets a feeling of accomplishment from participating in cure activities—a feeling that can never be attained washing dishes. The wife of a Los Gatos veterinarian and mother of two young children, Mrs. Fremont has found time to advise a Brownie troop, serve on the Los Gatos Advisory Committee for a new town park, and serve as secretary of the Los Gatos Council.

In addition she has been active on the Youth Centers' Finance Committee. A former resident of San Francisco, she has lived here six years and believes a small town can have many active groups because it's easier to reach people and to enlist their co-operation.

Keeping the Town of Los Gatos in good civic shape is the job of Karl Baldwin. Baldwin was appointed town manager by councilmen last May.

The young public administrator came here from San Mateo where he was assistant city manager.

During World War II he served as a Navy lieutenant (jg) in the South Pacific Area. He and his wife Eileen live at 148 New York Ave.

CHIEF L. M. PHILLIPS OF LOS GATOS

Western-garbed Jeff England, 91, was an Indian scout for Bill Cody. He has lived a rustic life in the Santa Cruz mountains for five or six years.

He was a member of the Dawson party who went to Alaska during the gold rush and founded the town of the same name.

When England comes to town, he usually indulges in a bit of oyster stew at a local restaurant.

Mrs. Carl Stephenson has one of the more unique first names. She was named Coquille after a river in Southern Oregon.

“Coke” as her friends call her is the court clerk of the Los Gatos-Saratoga-Campbell judicial district, a job she's held for two and a half years.

She and her husband and three children have lived in Los Gatos eight years. They reside at 18640 Maude Ave. Active in masonic organizations, Mrs. Stephenson is associate matron of Los Gatos Chapter of Eastern Star.

Whether he's driving a police car or riding a police motorcycle, Officer Bill Griswold is a “friendly cop.”

Griswold joined the Los Gatos force in 1948. He attended police school in Santa Rita and was an M.P. in the Army during World War II. He and his wife, Joan, and one daughter live at 16870 Fillmer Ave.

SARATOGA

Saratoga, a residential community bounded by orchards and subdivisions, is home to an estimated 2700 persons. Although unincorporated, the area has an expanded elementary school district, a newly reorganized chamber of commerce, and active community groups.

A well-known Saratoga resident is Postmaster Lewellyn B. Peck. Peck arrived here in 1921 to publish the weekly Saratoga Star. A newspaperman of long standing, he had been on the staffs of several California dailies including the Fresno Republican and the San Francisco Call.

His wife is Mrs. Lida O'Bannon Peck, retired adult education teacher in San Jose, Los Gatos and San Mateo County Adult Centers. They have two sons and three grandchildren.

Peck belongs to Saratoga Lions, Saratoga Men's Club and the Federated Church. He and Mrs. Peck live on Orchard Road.

A man who travels the West Valley every day and who makes his home in Saratoga is Judge Paul W. Crawford, head of the Los Gatos-Saratoga-Campbell Judicial District.

Crawford started his law career as an attorney in Los Animas, Colo. After coming to Saratoga seven years ago, with his wife, Althea, Crawford was appointed judge in Saratoga. Then in January, 1953, when the judicial district was created by a constitutional amendment, he was elected to the post.

Mr. and Mrs. Crawford live at 2800 Wordell Road.

Charles Hunter has been in the banking profession for 14 years. In Saratoga, he manages the Bank of America, and has been manager of branch banks in Dinuba and Los Gatos. Hunter came here in November, 1951.

WATCH SPEED LIMITS

California motorists planning to drive over freeways and turnpikes in the Eastern United States are cautioned by the National Automobile Club to observe all posted speed limits.

The Pennsylvania Turnpike Commission and other state bodies have recently made drastic reductions in these speed limits in various areas in a concerted effort to cut down on the large number of serious and fatal traffic accidents.

Typical of the ways in which the authorities are cracking down on speeders is the practice on the new Turner Turnpike between Oklahoma City and Tulsa of stamping the time on a driver's ticket when he enters and then checking it when he leaves. If, according to the time elapsed, he has driven this stretch faster than he should have, he is given a ticket for speeding.

MAKE IT ROUTINE

Car care, like brushing the teeth, reaches its zenith when it is made a routine proposition, points out the National Automobile Club. The efficient motorist is the one who has a regular schedule to which he rigidly adheres. In the matter of keeping the tires constantly at the right pressure, this system is an excellent one. Why not set aside a certain day every week for this process?

YOU MAKE IT SAFE

Your car is only as mechanically safe as you make it, points out the National Automobile Club.

Approach all curves with caution, advises the National Automobile Club.

LET IT COOL

Ten to fifteen minutes usually is regarded as a sufficient interval to allow the engine to cool before adding water if the radiator content has become unduly low causing the motor to become overheated, reports the National Automobile Club.

Lena is in charge of the kids' program at the range and has his official NRA instructor's arm band and a swell group of kids in the class.

By now you probably know the regional matches have been definitely called off in Bakersfield with the probability of them going south—mayhap to San Diego.

And who do you think is back at the range? None other than Sgt. Cliff Smith who announced his retirement a few months ago only to come begging for his job when he found it wasn't so much fun being a civilian. Sgt. Gus Palmiri was taking over for a while (and well liked, too) but the constant popping of the guns got his ears so the doctor told Gus to get where it was quieter. This made Cliff sore as the devil—oh, yeh?

Captain Jacobs, of the California Highway Patrol, informs me he is very anxious to hold a couple of pistol matches on his own up in Woodland this spring and maybe a couple more in the fall. Cap will sponsor the matches himself to see if the shooters would be interested in such a match. Woodland is about 100 miles from S. F. and if one cared to stay over Saturday nite there is ample motel and hotel accommodations around the vicinity. More about the match as it progresses.

One of my secret ambitions is to go to a pistol match and hear everyone say they are having a swell day and shooting swell scores. But I should live that long. Utopia and maybe Technocracy or Eureka!!!

And the guy who bought target 13 failed to show up all day long. Maybe the guy was superstitious and bought another set of squadding tickets on another target.

And the boys were disturbed about the lateness of the matches.

THE OAKLAND MATCHES

Speaking of a big opening day at the SF matches, just take a look at the opening day, March 7th, at Oakland with over 240 shooters laying down that long green for a chance at the medals they were passing out. There were five relays in each match and set a new club record, passing that established in 1940 when they almost had five relays in each match, and as you already know the gang got home a lot later than the good wife intended they should. Some of the boys skipped the last match so as not to incur the wrath of the squaw—anyhow it was one swell day and to coin a new phrase, "a good time was had by all."

Ray Ottoboni, one of the San Mateo sheriff's office, is also contemplating holding a few shoots for the gang at the old pistol range in Colma. Ray is now having the range re-graded and plans on adding 8 more firing points bringing the total up to 24 in all. Within the next two months we should be hearing from Ray as to when the gala opening will be announced.

After a two year lay-off ex-Lt. Cliff Hatch arrives on the lot all full of that vinegar and stuff expecting to slay the boys with his fancy pistolering. Alas and alack, the long lay-off was too long for our hero and he flopped by the wayside—and in a puddle of mud, too!! Cliff still claims he is the perpetual marksman and hopes never to get out of that class. Move over, Cliff, I'll be right with you.

Ed Rosenberg was in a bad way all during the matches because he knew he had one bum, poorly loaded shell in the box but wasn't too sure as to which one it was. Every time he'd pull the trigger he didn't know whether it was going off or just—poof! However, it didn't poof all day and by 11 o'clock Ed was so jumpy and full of the bounce he wasn't worth the powder to blow him up.

One thing you have to say about Al Heath is that at least he is starting his wife's shooting lessons with a .22 gun instead of the usual .45 cannon a man thinks he should give his wife to begin her shooting career. After the wife gets her arm nearly jerked off from the .45 monster she is more than ready to go back to knitting and baking—but does hubby start off with the .45? Oh, gosh, no—that's too tuff to start on.

"Spike" Spiken tells me that this Sunday that he has been nearer the 280 mark in the Camp Perry match than in over 4 years. Spike just made 280 and for the rest of the day felt as though he really knew how to shoot.

Tony Daily, of the Oakland Police Department, and Charley Johnson of Santa Cruz were shooting side by side in the .22 national match and each finished with the identical score 89-92-91. Tony never got over the affair and for the rest of the day he made it a special point to tell everybody on the lot all about it.

Y'know there is something I never could figure out and would like the answer—or some sort of an answer because I don't think there is a real answer to it. Why does a guy have to tuck one of his pants legs into those low cowboy boots they wear?

Lou Panecaldo, from Gridley, learns fast, fast, fast. At his first shoot Sunday he had 9 shots on his target (which ain't bad for a tyro) but swears by the nine gods that the shot he had in the 9 ring was a double. Some wise guy has been coaching Lou but Lou hasn't taken his lessons to heart as not a darn guy at the scoring table could find that double. Nice try, Lou, keep it up and some day maybe you'll hit the jack-pot.

In the first match of the day there were 64 shooters in the expert class but only three medals were given out which caused some to ask why don't they give out extra medals in that class when there were more than 24 entries. The answer is very simple. The only class in which extra medals are given out is in the marksman class. O.K.? O.K.

Usually a stray dog runs up the hill in back of the backstops and delays the matches until the pooch is chased off. Sunday there were three kids running up the hill and later followed by some goof in an auto. Some one hollered out "to fire a shot across their bows" but that's just what they don't want to happen as the shot might come closer than the bow.

Ken Kolb, of the Highway Patrol, has a peculiar and fantastic way of getting in the news. Sunday he bellies up to the squadding window and buys tickets for all the matches—but no, he didn't buy 'em because he discovered his wallet was gone—driver's license and cash. Left the darned thing home. And Ken just got thru giving a poor guy up near Vallejo a ticket for not having his driver's license with him!

Pete Peters, of San Rafael, Jack Ahern, of the SFPD, and Ray Ottoboni of the San Mateo Sheriff's office are about the oldest shooters, in point of shooting years around the bay area. The three young fellows started at the old Kentfield range in 1927 and have been going ever since. That's kinda hard to believe as I don't think Jack was old enuf to lift a pistol in 1927.

Merv Given, the range exec, sure believes in getting things in shape for the day's shooting. Merv gets up at 4:30 on match days and within an hour is chugging up the hill toward the range so he can set the 50 yard targets out, clean the benches, cut the grass—and wake up Spike, the caretaker. Merv will go places—it may not be far but the boy is going.

ARM SIGNALS

Some drivers give arm signals in such a sloppy way that their intent seems to be to confuse the driver behind rather than to warn him of what they are about to do, points out the National Automobile Club. How do you make arm signals? Are your signals designed to warn, or confuse?

POINT TO REMEMBER

Among the things that the motorist might well remember is the fact that being towed requires a higher type of alertness than does driving the car under its own power, points out the National Automobile Club.

LEFT HAND TURNS

Make those left hand turns with patience and care, advises the National Automobile Club.

QUICK BRAKING

Quick, positive braking means locked wheels and locked wheels will slide, warns the National Automobile Club.

Twenty-five per cent of all drivers involved in fatal auto accidents in the U.S. last year were under 25 years old.

The Hunters, who have three children, live at 24060 Williams Ave.

Getting more buildings to accommodate the area's growing elementary school population is the task of Saratoga Elementary School Superintendent Dan Ungaro, and his school trustees. The district now has two schools—Saratoga Elementary, which Ungaro has administered as principal since 1946, and Fruitvale School which opened this Fall.

He was appointed superintendent in 1952. His first teaching job was in Roseville, Calif.

He and his wife and baby daughter, Michele, live on Thelma Ave.

Mrs. Virgil Campbell and her husband have two teen-age sons. Perhaps that is why they are both working industriously to perfect the expansion and growth of Los Gatos Union High School. Mrs. Campbell is president of the high school PHT. Mr. Campbell is clerk of the high school board of trustees.

Mrs. Campbell, a graduate of San Jose State, serves as secretary of the Saratoga Youth Center, Inc.

The Campbells have lived here since 1935. Mr. Campbell is a grocer. The family resides at 14482 Oak Place.

PERSEVERANCE PAYS

Proof that perseverance in police work pays off was exemplified in a case which had its beginning back in March when Sacramento Detective Carl Blasofsel came into possession of a bit of information which threw a light of suspicion on three men.

The information was meager and not considered absolutely reliable. It labeled the trio as good burglary suspects. And it indicated the men were ready to pull a job.

Blasofsel, whose dogged determination to see every case through to a successful conclusion is unmatched, began tailing the trio. He, with the aid of fellow detectives, North Sacramento police officers and sheriff's deputies, kept the three under surveillance day and night. Time passed but nothing happened.

Once Blasofsel had reason to believe the men were planning a holdup. The information appeared reasonably reliable so stakeouts were maintained on a couple of stores which were labeled likely targets. Still no crime was committed.

As time went on periodic checks were made on the trio and law enforcement officers were alerted of their suspected activities.

Early one morning in April Assistant Chief of Police Percy Cassaway, Sergeant Walter Land and Patrolman Pete Reineberg of North Sacramento saw the three cruising in the vicinity of a grocery market. The officers parked nearby where they could watch the rear door.

When they saw the three force open the door they radioed for reinforcements.

Five sheriff's cars and another North Sacramento police car responded and a cordon was formed around the market. When the burglars ignored orders to walk out some of the officers entered.

Gassaway spotted one of the burglars hiding in a storeroom and told him to step out. When he did not respond Gassaway fired one shot over his head and again ordered him out. This time he responded. Other officers routed the two others. Two of the burglars were armed.

Subsequent investigations disclosed the three were responsible for another market burglary in which $500 worth of merchandise was taken. One of the men admitted he and his companions had planned to stage a holdup of the market in which they were caught but backed out. He also admitted a robbery of a Sacramento bar had been planned.

Chief of Detectives George Lofquist, commenting on the work Blasofsel did, noted there is no substitute for perseverance in the investigation of a case. No lead, regardless of how small it might be, can be overlooked, he said.

Special events on the institute calendar include two dinner meetings, a night baseball game between the Cleveland Indians and the New York Yankees; and the final banquet Saturday noon, when certificates will be awarded to persons completing the course.

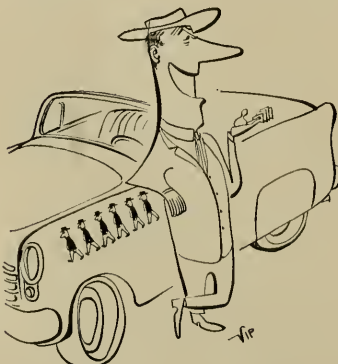

Institute sessions will take place at the year-old, $800,000 coroner's office and laboratory in Cleveland, and at the nearby home of the WRU School of Law. Housing will be available at Claud Foster Hall, WRU's new men's dormitory, for $15 for the entire week of the workshop. Hotel and motel facilities also are located in the university area.

This June's police science workshop is planned as part of the three-fold program of teaching, research and publication under way at the Law-Medicine Center. Two 18-week legal medicine courses have been given on an experimental basis, before the Center actually was established Feb. 1, 1954. Pilot research study concerns homicide in Cleveland, and first volume in the Center's legal medicine series will be "The Physician in the Courtroom," to be published by the Western Reserve University Press this Spring.

Detailed information and application forms for the Institute on Science in Law Enforcement are available from: Oliver C. Schroeder, Jr., Director, Law-Medicine Center, Western Reserve University, Cleveland 6, Ohio.

BEING TOO GOOD

Some drivers, according to the National Automobile Club, are so good that they become overconfident and indulge in careless driving practices. Such motorists, points out the National Automobile Club, should remember that on our streets and highways, a little carelessness can kill.

a member of the board of trustees of the Fremont Union High School District for 17 years, the past 10 as its president.

Burr M. Matthews came to Sunnyvale 22 years ago and operates an appliance store and a real estate business. He lives at 85 Oak Ave., Mountain View.

Matthews is a native of Pietermaritzburg, South Africa, and was brought to the United States by his American father when he was 7 years old. He lived in Colorado and St. Louis before coming to California.

Before coming to Sunnyvale, Matthews lived in Oakland for 12 years engaging in the contracting and building business. He is past president of the Chamber of Commerce and of the Sunnyvale Lions Club.

The Rev. Charles S. Gienger, pastor of St. Martin's Church, has been largely responsible for the beautiful new St. Martin's Parochial School on Old San Francisco Road.

He confided that he was sent here to accomplish just that in 1949. Father Gienger is a native of San Francisco who started his education for the priesthood in 1918 at St. Patrick's Seminary in Menlo Park.

He was forced to interrupt this school for a five year period during which he left the seminary and worked for a large San Francisco store to assist his family.

Later he was able to continue his education for his calling and was ordained a priest in 1933.

H. Kenney Hunter is known, by name at least, to every Sunnyvale citizen. He is city manager.

Hunter is a native of Nashville, Tenn., but came to Sacramento in 1922. He attended the University of California in Berkeley, majoring in economics and taking graduate work in public administration.

After employment with a management consultant firm in San Francisco for about three years, he joined the California State Personnel Board.

He became Sunnyvale's first city manager in December, 1949, when the new City Charter became effective.

He is married, lives at 423 Southwood Drive and has two children. Hunter belongs to the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco, the Lions Club in Sunnyvale and to various associations of city managers and public administrators.

Another well-known business man in Sunnyvale is Robert H. Hamilton, whose R. H. Hamilton Co. on N. Sunnyvale Ave. manufactures store fixtures and does mill and cabinet work.

MOUNTAIN VIEW

Mrs. Armanini a native of San Francisco, born May Jennings, and her parents have been South San Francisco druggists for the past 45 years. The Armaninis' daughters are Patricia, 20; Elaine, 18; Gail, 14, and Carol, 9.

Her record of civic service in Mountain View includes seven years on the City Recreation Commission, chairmanship of the annual city pet parade several years, PTA work, Woman's Club activities and leadership in the Girl Scouts.

In 1952 she was chairman of the city's highly successful united community fund drive for residential areas. She is a graduate of the University of California and a registered pharmacist. She admits that community activities, keeping up a home and raising four children, and helping regularly in the store do not allow her much time for cultivation of hobbies.

A comparative newcomer to Mountain View is Francis Wallace, brisk young manager of the Mountain View Chamber of Commerce. Fran, as he is known to everybody in town, came to this job two years ago from a background of salesmanship, five years with the American Red Cross and a year and a half with the National Safety Council. He was graduated from Macalaster College, St. Paul, Minn., in 1941. His Red Cross service began in 1939 when he was still an undergraduate.

He had a look at California in 1941, liked what he saw, and persuaded the Red Cross to transfer him to San Francisco in 1943. He and his wife, Ruth, have two sons and a daughter. His hobby is Boy Scouts.

He is presently district camp and did his post-graduate work in Emory University, Atlanta, Ga. He is a member of Mountain View Kiwanis Club. For relaxation he likes swimming, skating and taking his family to the beach.

James K. Thomas is hardly a Mountain View old timer, arriving in the city from Grand Coulee Dam in Washington State in July, 1939; but if he is a newcomer he must be classed as an old-time newcomer, since the big influx of population has been since then.

Thomas has been city manager of Mountain View since October, 1952. He was first employed by the city in June, 1946, as superintendent of public works, and became city administrator in 1949.

He and his wife, Elsie, have a daughter, now Mrs. David E. Farley, Campbell.

"If you are going to say anything about me at all," he declared, "You must also mention that I have a grandson."

BONDS FOR JAIL

The culmination of years of work and effort on the part of Sheriff Don Cox may be in sight if Sacramento County voters approve a $3,000,000 bond issue which has been placed on the ballot for the June 8th elections.

The bond issue, the first scheduled by the county government in 40 years, provides $1,250,000 for the construction of a new county jail and $250,000 to remodel the present jail.

This work, and higher pay for his deputies, are projects which Cox has advocated unceasingly for many years.

The sheriff pointed out the inadequacy of the present jail facilities time and again but failed to get the board of supervisors to act on his recommendations until this spring.

A site for the proposed new jail has not been definitely selected yet but indications are that it will be built adjacent to the present jail.

Members of the board of supervisors had hoped to build it at the site of the Airport Road camp south of Sacramento but were informed bonding experts believe it would be built next to the present facilities to make what they termed "a package deal" out of it.

In addition, the county does not have completely clear title to the acreage where the road camp is located.

Final plans for the new jail have not been completed but Cox said it probably would be built in the form of an L and possibly would be 10 stories high. A garage and parking space could be provided beneath the building.

Cox said he would like to see the present facilities remodeled for use as a receiving jail where prisoners could be held for short periods before being transferred to the new jail or to a road camp.

Cox knows whereof he speaks when he points out the inadequacy of the present county jail setup. During his service he has seen the activity of the jail increase by at least six times, from 1,091 prisoners to more than 6,000 who pass through the jail annually.

He was appointed sheriff by the board of supervisors in 1932 to fill out the term of the late Ellis Jones when Jones resigned. Cox started with the sheriff's office as a deputy in 1921 and advanced through the ranks to become undersheriff, the post he held at the time of his appointment.

Shortly after he went to work for the sheriff's office he took up the study of law as an aid to his law enforcement activities. He was admitted to practice at the California State Bar in 1926 and has been a member of the bar association since then.

Cox's thorough background in law enforcement and his everpresent desire to serve the residents of Sacramento County has made his office one of the finest in the state.

His record shows Sacramento County is relatively free of major crime. When it does crop up his able staff works with speed and efficiency to eliminate it. Proof of this lies in the fact organized crime never has been able to gain even a toehold in the county since Cox took over as sheriff.

SHERIFF COX

Cox does more than protect the people of Sacramento County from criminals. He looks after something which means much more to many people than their fear of criminals—their pocketbooks.

Despite an increase in population and a corresponding expansion of law enforcement activities during the last 15 years Cox has been able to show a decrease in the cost of running the office in proportion to the number of prisoners handled.

The June 8th elections, by the way, hold more interest for Cox than just the bond issue. He is on the ballot for reelection to his sixth term as sheriff. Nothing to worry about, though. He has no opposition.

ORCHARD CITY

The church, the school and the government are integral parts of any community. Campbell, the Orchard City, is proud of the persons who provide efficient leadership in these three spheres. Here are some of them.

Mrs. Gussie Baker holds the honor of being the only woman superintendent in the county. As superintendent of Moreland School District, she also watches over the oldest known school district in California. Moreland district was established in 1851.

Mrs. Baker is also principal of Moreland School (historical landmark 489), a job she has held since 1941. She has been superintendent since 1952.

Entering the field of education 28 years ago, Mrs. Baker got her first teaching experience in the elementary schools of Modoc, Calif. She lives at 297 Carlyn Ave.

Campbell's police chief, Bob Locke, has lived here since 1940. He was named to the force after the city incorporated in March, 1952. He then rose to the rank of senior officer and in November was named chief.

He supervises an efficient four-man force and 15 auxiliary policemen. Locke served with the Army of Occupation in Korea with the counter-intelligence corps as an M.P.

He and his wife, Merle, and four children live at 466 E. Casey Ave.

Jack of all repairs—especially street repairs—is Le Roy H. Black, who heads the city's maintenance department. Black, a former Marine Corps sergeant, moved here in September.

A native of Santa Monica, he came to San Jose in 1948 with his wife, Norma, and young son, Richard. They live at 126 E. Campbell Ave.

Another essential figure in any community is the postmaster. This job has been held for 20 years by Ira H. Grim, of 46 S. Third St.

Grim has lived in Campbell since 1919. He has been very active in civic affairs. He served two terms as president of the Chamber of Commerce, was chairman of the 1954 Old Settlers Day Parade, and is a member of the Kiwanis Club.

Born and raised in West Virginia, Grim and his wife have five children.

Leader of the community's second oldest church, the Campbell Congregational Church founded in 1889, is the Rev. Corwin H. Olds. Olds and his family have lived here five and a half years.

He came here from Berkeley where he was an official in the Pacific School of Religion.

MISSION CITY

Getting to know folks in the Mission City is easy when one strolls leisurely down Franklin St. where, sooner or later, all Santa Clara convenes to do business and to pass the time of day.

Hub of the small city that is growing fast is the City Hall of course, where all doors are open and the city's officialdom is friendly and easy to approach.

Take City Manager Joseph F. Base, for instance, who came here from Ellensburg, Wash., to become Mission Town's first city manager. In two years he has put the city on a sound operating basis with his background of 10 years experience in civil, sanitary, and construction engineering. As busy as he is, a visitor can usually corner him for a few minutes of interesting and informative conversation.

En route to see the city manager, a City Hall visitor can always spot City Clerk A. S. (Steve) Belick, pecking at an adding machine, phoning, or talking over a problem with a taxpayer at the counter. Belick is a graduate of University of Santa Clara and a veteran of World War II in which he worked up the hard way from private to major in the field artillery.

Downstairs is the office of City Attorney Robley E. Morgan, veteran lawyer and amateur photographer of considerable note. Morgan succeeded his partner, Judge Charles A. Thompson, in 1950 when the latter retired. Thompson still retains his activity in the law office and is usually around discussing matters with his deputy of some 34 years standing.

A man who knows every square inch of expanding Santa Clara is City Engineer Edgar C. Schott who maintains a busy little office downstairs in the rear of the City Hall building. The city's phenomenal rise from sleepy agriculture to bustling industry is a tribute to Schott's foresight. The suntanned engineer is a fishing and hunting enthusiast and plays the piano with a deft touch. Before becoming city engineer in 1940, Schott taught at University of Santa Clara.

Around the corner of the building from Schott's office is the Police Department where Chief William J. Garrity directs operations. Garrity appointed to the post last year, is a graduate of the FBI police training course and was once chief of the Santa Barbara police force. When the charter was changed to make the post elective, the voters retained Garrity in office to continue his work of reorganizing the department.

Three years ago, Fire Chief Leonard George won the nomination for the job from all five volunteer fire companies in the city. George and other paid members of the regular fire department can be found in the brand new main fire station a few blocks from City Hall, unless the city's raucous fire horn happens to be sounding at the moment.

A city collector who carries on his official collection duties on an even grander scale at home is Willard N. Norris. Norris has a unique hobby in that he gathers distinctive insignia, medals, and decorations of the U. S. military service. He's been doing it for some 22 years and has over 3000 badges and other decorations at his home. He served in the coast artillery in the first world war.

One of Santa Clara's proudest possessions is its efficient municipal electric department and the man who heads it is Sherman D. Jackson. The electrical superintendent is continually on the move, supervising installation of new power units, checking lines and keeping the system up to snuff at all times.

SECOND CHANCE

SANTA CLARA — The Juvenile Advisory Council was organized a few months ago to keep youngsters out of further trouble after they once become entangled with the law. It is headed by an attorney who lives in Santa Clara and practices law in San Jose. Austen Warburton, civic leader in the Mission City, holds down important post in the Santa Clara County organization to prevent juvenile delinquency. William Garrity, Santa Clara police chief, took the lead in forming the Juvenile Advisory Council. He wanted to give youngsters a second chance by putting behind them their first offenses.

Boys and girls singled out for a second chance are those whom law enforcement officers feel will benefit by guidance rather than detention home confinement.

The Juvenile Advisory Council meets the last Saturday in each month and ferrets out the cause of the child's behavior. It studies testimony presented and makes a decision which does not have legal machinery behind it—but has an influence in the community and on the child's future welfare.

The council is comprised of two members of the clergy, the Rev. Paul Nelson of the Community Church of Santa Clara, and the Rev. Walter Schmidt, S.J., director of the Santa Clara County Youth Center, and Miss Katherine Graham and Joseph Laurencio, civic leaders. Police Chief Garrity and Mrs. Edna Mirrione, Santa Clara police matron, also attend the juvenile council meetings.

HUNTING ACCIDENTS

What can be done to prevent hunting accidents and other mishaps involving sporting firearms?

The most realistic approach to a solution of this perennial problem is the so-called "New Hampshire Plan"—based on the premise that high school students given thorough training in safe gun handling will be spared shooting accidents.

By mustering the officials in education, conservation, law enforcement and two authorities from Western-Winchester, the White Mountain State during the past year has established a program designed to teach every boy and girl in its public school system how to use a shotgun or rifle without endangering themselves and others.

Several thousand youngsters in high schools throughout the state this spring are attending indoor and outdoor classes as an extra-curricular activity. State authorities estimate that 30,000 boys and girls will be trained to handle guns safely within a few years.

Although the New Hampshire Firearms Safety Education Program has been underway only since last September, it has proven so successful that those in charge plan to establish additional classes in junior high schools and in primary grades possibly by this September. Interest on the adult level is so great that three high schools in the state have started safety classes for experienced hunters, and sportsmen's organizations in other areas already have instituted moves to install similar study sessions for all those interested in hunting or target shooting, regardless of how many years they have been handling firearms.

New Hampshire took its first step in the pioneering effort "to make every shooter a safe shooter" in March of last year. Bowdoin Plumer, editor of the "Bristol Enterprise" and a member of the state legislature, conferred with officials of the Department of Education, the Fish and Game Department and the State Police about possible steps which might be taken to establish a training program through the schools.

When these officials agreed to take over the job of actuating such a program, legislation was prepared and immediately passed enabling any school district in the state "to include instruction in the safe and proper handling of firearms."

The New Hampshire Firearms Safety Education Program then was prepared by Jack George, physical education director of the Department of Education; John Dodge, conservation educator for the Fish and Game Department; James Dee, Western-Winchester's field representative in New Hampshire, and Vincent Tiefenbrunn, shooting promotions director of Western-Winchester. Dee and Tiefenbrunn were called in as consultants because of their years of service in establishing junior shooting programs and because both are qualified National Rifle Association instructors. "Tief" also is a director of the association.

As outlined in a booklet prepared by this quarter at the state capitol, the program called for the qualifying of at least one teacher in each high school as an NRA instructor in gun handling. Each of these trained teachers in turn would conduct classes which would give four hours of theory and practice of safety for every boy and girl.

All procedures were to be based on those which have been established by the National Rifle Association. In addition to instruction in the handling of all types of sporting firearms, the youngsters would be taught how to determine whether a gun or rifle was in proper condition for shooting.

Copies of the program booklet were distributed throughout New Hampshire to officials of schools in each district, physical education instructors, YMCA personnel and to conservation officers and members of the state police.

Reaction was immediate. A majority of the school superintendents and principals contacted the office of Jack George to request assistance in setting up safety classes.

Although half a dozen schools from the start were able to begin sessions because a qualified N.R.A. instructor was on the faculty, the majority sought information on how a teacher assigned to the program could receive the necessary training.

With Jim Dee as technical advisor, the first few weeks of September were spent by Jack George and John Dodge in setting up classes in six public high schools ready to take part in the program. In addition to these schools, they answered a request from two of the state's largest parochial high schools to give them help.

Their net step was to qualify all conservation officers and a group of state police volunteers as instructors and consultants. Principal activity of these uniformed men would be to act as teachers to high school faculty members assigned by their principals to the new project.

On January 21 of this year, a three-day course in firearms and their safe handling was opened at the University of New Hampshire for all 35 conservation officers of New Hampshire's Fish and Game Department and 12 state troopers.

It proved so successful that a similar course was held beginning March 22 with Jim Dee as its head at the University for school officials and 50 teachers from all parts of the state. This made it possible for more than half of the 92 public high schools to begin classes for their students immediately following the training course.

Instruction to the youngsters covers both small and large caliber rifles and all types of shotguns. Indoor sessions cover nomenclature of firearms parts, mechanism and operation of guns, ammunition, determination of unsafe firearms and the traditional ten commandments of safe gun handling.

Instruction in the handling of firearms safely is given both in the school gymnasium and in nearby wooded areas. Boys and girls are shown how to cross over, through or under various types of fences and instructed in the proper method of hunting for maximum safety while walking abreast or in line. Written and demonstration tests must be passed by the youngsters before they are graduated from the safety classes.

One of the most ardent supporters of the "New Hampshire Plan" is youthful Governor Hugh Gregg, a former Army officer and father of a 10-year-old boy. The chief executive was qualified as an instructor after he took part in the training course for conservation officers and state police early this year.

Governor Gregg is opposed to restrictive legislation as a step toward preventing hunting accidents. He believes that accidents are caused by ignorance and carelessness and that education can eliminate these causes.

"The youngster or grownup who knows—really knows—guns and how to handle them safely at all times, loaded or unloaded," said the governor, "isn't going to hurt himself or someone else."

In the short time that New Hampshire has made the safety program a part of its educational training, interest in it has developed throughout the country. Legislators, teachers, sportsmen's organizations, conservation authorities and parents by the thousands have flooded Jack George and John Dodge with queries on how they can set up a similar program in their states.

Already Maine proposes to follow in the footsteps of its neighboring state very soon. Vermont and Massachusetts conservationists and educators have sent representatives to Concord to study the New Hampshire Plan. Other states plan to send officials for conferences with George and Dodge.

One of the top experts in the field of gun safety is General Meritt Edson, famous Marine hero and head of the National Rifle Association. He has made several trips to study the plan and considers it one of the finest ever developed as a move against restrictive laws.

"Daniel Webster used to claim that the nation always could look to New Hampshire for progressive thinking" said the general recently. "As a result of my observation of the Firearms Safety Education Program, I'm inclined to think he wasn't exaggerating."

SAFER CARS

We all know that the automobile has undergone some considerable changes in both appearance and power since it first appeared on the American scene but not too many of us are aware, points out the National Automobile Club, of the quite considerable changes that it has undergone to make it a safer means of transportation.

When the transition from the carriage with a horse to the carriage without a horse was first being made, the coach-makers went to work with a will to turn out some very fancy bodies made entirely of wood or, a little later, of wood with sheet metal nailed over it. All this looked very fine, but if you happened to hit a tree or even an extra large bump in the road, you were apt to end up sitting in the middle of a jumbled heap of sheet metal and quite badly bruised and cut to boot. Today's all steel bodies will take a much greater beating with much greater grace.

Some important steps, too, have been taken to cut down on driver fatigue, that contributor to catastrophic accidents. Insulation has all but done away with the noise of the motor. The grouping, simplifying, or eliminating of controls has made driving an easier chore. Consider how the hand controlled spark has gone, and the hand controlled throttle has become foot controlled, how the gear shift has moved from the floor, to the steering wheel, and then to nowhere at all. The grouping and lighting of instruments on the dashboard has made it much easier for the driver to read them and get his eyes back on the road ahead.

Safety refinements inside the body have come along apace: seats wider for more elbow room, doors hinged at the front to prevent the wind from taking them if they should begin to open, handles curved in or replaced by buttons to prevent snagging of clothing, locks made more inaccessible to children to prevent them from falling out, and no-draft ventilation to keep the driver free from drowsiness.

UNIFORM CRIME REPORTS

The 1953 annual Uniform Crime Reports bulletin reveals the continuing increase of crime in the United States. The previous record number of crimes set in 1952 increased six per cent last year. The estimated number of major crimes totaled 2,159,080.

Rural crimes increased by a considerably larger percentage, 9.6, than did city crimes, up 4.5 per cent. Urban crimes in 1953 were 39 per cent above the pre-World War II average of 1937-39.

The 1953 annual Uniform Crime Reports bulletin, based upon data submitted to the FBI by law enforcement agencies throughout the United States, reflects the following trends:

There were an estimated 2,159,080 major crimes in the United States during 1953, an increase of six per cent over the 1952 figure of 2,036,510.

Robberies led the individual increases with an 8.5 per cent rise over 1952, and burglaries followed closely with an increase of 8.2 per cent.

Larceny rose 5.4 per cent, aggravated assault 5.3 per cent, and auto theft 5.2 per cent. Crimes of rape increased 3.8 per cent; negligent manslaughter was up 0.7 per cent. Murders were 1.2 per cent lower than in 1952, the only decline noted in the 1953 statistics.

In the urban areas of the country, crime was up 4.5 per cent over 1952, with increases ranging from 2.6 per cent for rape to 8.3 per cent for robbery. The only decrease noted was in the murder category, down 2.2 per cent.

Rural crimes in 1953 jumped 9.6 per cent higher than the 1952 total. The increases ranged from 0.4 per cent for murders to 16.5 per cent for burglaries. Negligent manslaughters, down 5.5 per cent, showed the only rural decrease.

Seasonal variations in crime during 1953 generally followed the pattern established in previous years. Murder and aggravated assault started from their lowest points in the early part of 1953 and reached their peaks in the summer months. Rape also was more prevalent during the summer. On the other hand, robberies, burglaries and auto thefts occurred less frequently in the summer than in the cold months. Larceny-theft tended to rise steadily from the beginning to the end of the year.

Negligent manslaughter was the only crime against the person to reach its lowest peak in the summer. Chiefly comprised of traffic fatalities wherein the police investigation establishes gross negligence, negligent manslaughter tends to rise sharply during the winter when driving conditions may be generally less favorable.

A tabulation of reports from 400 cities reflected that the value of property stolen in those cities last year totaled $224,552,605. An average value of $1,038 was placed upon 124,607 automobiles stolen in the 400 cities last year. Victims in these cities lost $222 in the average robbery, $163 in the average burglary, and $76 in thefts of property excluding automobiles.

Data for 1953 concerning the age, sex and race of persons arrested is based upon reports which were submitted by law enforcement agencies representing 1,174 American cities. This is the second successive year these figures have been published. One of the long-range goals of the Uniform Crime Reports program has been to obtain complete data concerning the age, sex and race of persons arrested directly from law enforcement agencies. This goal was partially achieved in 1952 and 1953.

DIRECTOR J. EDGAR HOOVER

Complete reports concerning persons arrested during 1953 were received by the FBI from 1,174 cities. These cities, representing 37,255,808 persons, or approximately 42 per cent of the nation's urban population, submitted data concerning 1,791,160 arrests.

The 1,174 cities reported that more than eight times as many males as females were arrested during 1953. A study made of an average group of 1,000 male arrests and 1,000 female arrests showed that in proportion a higher percentage of the women than the men were charged with murder, aggravated assault, larceny, and embezzlement and fraud. This study further showed that a higher percentage of the men were charged with burglary and auto theft.

Of the 1,791,160 arrests recorded by the 1,174 reporting cities, 8.4 per cent were persons 17 years of age or less, and 14.7 per cent were under 21. In the category of auto thefts, 53.6 per cent of all persons arrested were juveniles, and in fact 29 per cent were not even old enough to get a regular driver's license in most states.

Nearly half of the persons arrested for burglary were not yet 18, and two-thirds of these were under 16 years of age. Persons under 21 represented 50.6 per cent of the arrests for crimes against property—robbery, burglary, larceny, auto theft, embezzlement and fraud, buying and receiving stolen property, and forgery and counterfeiting.

RIGHT-OF-WAY

Many serious accidents are caused by drivers who may have the right of way but who insist on their rights in the face of almost certain disaster. This combination of stubbornness and today's high-speed traffic has killed thousands, says the California State Automobile Association. A driver who lets his actions result in an accident, even when he has the right of way, may be held at fault by the court if he has the last clear chance to prevent it.

BIG YELLOW BUS

"Just who is the driver of that big yellow bus?"

Any mother who scrubs and starches and sends her bright-eyed youngster off to catch the school bus for the first time wants the answer to this question; and others, too.

"How does the driver happen to be there?"

"Does he know his job?"

"Does he keep his bus in good condition?"

"Is my child safe in his hands?"

It's only natural, since mother cannot take her youngster to school herself, that she wants to know all about the person who does the job.

The driver of the bus may be a man or a woman. Many women drive school buses in various areas of the State. He, or she, must be at least eighteen years of age and possess a valid California Operator's or Chauffeur's license. In order to obtain this license the applicant must pass vision, written and driving tests.

Not required, but helpful to the driver are a combination of many of the attributes of the diplomat, doctor, janitor, lawyer, mechanic, parent and policeman in addition to top-flight driving ability.

If the candidate possesses at least a majority of these attributes and a driver's license he is eligible for consideration for his school bus driver's certificate.

He must pass a complete physical examination and a written test on school bus operation and general traffic movement. Next comes an exacting driving test in a school bus. This test is conducted by a specially trained officer of the California Highway Patrol.

There is an investigation of the prospective driver's background to determine if he has ever committed a felony, or has violated vehicle code regulations pertaining to personal injury, drunk driving, or reckless driving for three years past. Convictions of these offenses or addiction to alcohol or narcotics or other habit-forming drugs result in immediate disqualification. Any act of moral turpitude or attempt to falsify an application likewise eliminates the candidate.

If the driver is of high moral character he is then instructed to obtain a first aid certificate from the American Red Cross or the Bureau of Mines. He has sixty days to obtain the card. Then he must execute a written agreement to abide by all provisions of law pertaining to safe transportation of pupils.

It is now apparent that the driver wants the job. A less determined person might have become discouraged and quit long ago.

"What does he do on the job?" the still apprehensive mother might ask.

Most important, always, the driver must drive carefully. He must always operate the bus in a safe manner, having due regard for the welfare of the pupils. He is responsible for the safety of children while they are loading and unloading, and shall escort them across the street when necessary for safety.

School bus drivers are charged with the orderly conduct of pupils on the bus and continued disorderly conduct of any student shall be grounds for denying transportation.

Each driver must submit weekly written reports to his employer concerning the condition of the bus. This, however, is no special effort as he must inspect the bus daily and is always aware of its condition. Daily checks include windshield and wipers, lights, horn, brakes and doors. Unless these items are all in good condition, the bus may not roll.

In the event of any accident the driver must immediately report the occurrence to the California Highway Patrol and must also remove the bus from operation if damage or defect makes continued use of the bus unsafe for transporting pupils.

Legal requirements state that no driver may work more than 15 hours in any 24 hours, and not more than 10 of these hours may be spent in actual driving. Of course, he must keep his bus clean at all times and is responsible for cleaning the bus at the end of each day's use.

There are other rules to protect the children. There must be adequate artificial light. The driver may not leave the bus when the motor is running or when the brakes are released. He must stop the bus and open the doors before crossing railroad tracks; and must not shift gears when actually crossing the tracks.

No animal may be taken onto a school bus, no smoking is permitted when children are on the bus, and intoxicants in any form are never allowed on a school bus. No bus may be loaded in a manner that will interfere with the vision of the operator.

Motorists know they must stop, regardless of direction of approach, any time they see the flashing red lights of the school bus. They also must remain stopped until the lights cease to flash. It is the job of the bus driver to see that these red lights are working as and when they should be.

Finally, the driver shall report to the California Highway Patrol the vehicle license number and, if possible, the name and address of any operator who is guilty of violating any provision of the Vehicle Code which in any way endangers the safety of the pupils being transported.

"How well is the job being done?"
 seems a logical question.

Based on California Department of Education figures, 5073 school buses carried 325,925 school children a total of 45,500,00 miles to and from school last year. All types of accidents involving school buses totaled 326. There were 70 injuries and two pupil deaths. Not all of the injured were children; some were drivers. The fatally injured children were crossing the street either to board, or after alighting from, the bus.

The river of the big yellow bus, then, is carefully selected, thoroughly trained and competent, and proud to be a member of that exclusive group of drivers who have compiled one of the best traffic safety records that exists anywhere.

When mother scrubs and straightens junior and puts him on the school bus, she can turn with vigor to her daily tasks. Her fledgling is in good hands.

TRAFFIC TAGS

If you get a traffic ticket, it's one-out-of-three it'll be for speeding.

In a survey just completed by the California Highway Patrol 33.7 percent of all traffic citations written by the Patrol were shown to be issued for driving too fast for existing conditions.

"Need of this type of enforcement is emphasized by the fact that 34.8 percent of all accidents in unincorporated areas of the state were caused by excessive speed and reckless driving," Patrol Commissioner B. R. Caldwell pointed out.

"Because speed is by far the greatest cause of accidents, we are directing a proportionate share of enforcement attention to this dangerous driving practice."

"Also, in order that no motorist may be taken by surprise, we want everyone to know in advance that an important objective of the Patrol will be the apprehension of speeders," he said.

"During the early part of this year a few motorists were arrested for speeds in excess of one hundred miles per hour, though the great majority of those stopped were traveling from five to fifteen miles per hour over the limit.

"Since it is widely known that speed kills, motorists should have enough feeling of self-preservation to observe the legal limits. If they don't they'll face the alternative of firm enforcement action." Caldwell declared.

HOLIDAY DRINKING

Don't let Holiday drinking end in Holiday dying, advises the National Automobile Club. If you've been drinking, don't drive.

SACRAMENTO CALIFORNIAID BUREAU ADVANCES

There have been many changes in the Sacramento Police Department's identification bureau and the one man who has been around to see most of them is Les Cox, superintendent of the bureau since 1937.

Cox, who succeeded Captain Max P. Fisher, founder of the bureau, recalls ancient systems of filing and complicated setups for taking identification photographs in use when he joined the bureau in February, 1922.

"At least I had it better than Captain Fisher," Cox declares with a smile, "He used shoe boxes for filing cabinets, and an old, beat up box camera to take mug shots when he opened the bureau about 1900."

When Cox first became part of the bureau the staff consisted of Captain Fisher, his daughter, Alice Fisher, and Irene Richter.

Today there are nine men and three women in the bureau. They include, in addition to Cox, John L. Crump, assistant superintendent, John D. Lane, Norman Readdy, James E. Smith, Herbert Hoover, Bryon W. Orser, Noel LaDue, Florence Vesey, LeAnn Manby and Lillian Ava Andretta.

In place of the old box camera are two of the latest type flash cameras, one of which takes both side and front views on the same negative and also can be used for full length photos. The bureau also has its own darkroom for processing photos.

Another camera for making copies of fingerprints and signatures also is part of the equipment.

To point up the growth of the department since he joined it, Cox estimates more than 400,000 individual records are on file today as compared to 100,000 then.

The department averages about 1,100 identifications annually. About 900 of this total are connected with criminal work while the remaining 200 in connection with license applications and the like.

The proximity of the bureau to the state department of criminal investigation and identification which has headquarters in the Capitol eliminates the need for a ballistics expert or chemist. All such work for the department is handled by the CII.

The great value of the identification bureau is spotlighted by the fact 15 burglaries, a grand theft and two petty theft cases were solved in 1953 by identifications made through latent fingerprints found at the scene. Cox said this figure has been about the annual average in the last few years.

Judge James M. McDonnell, who has been closely associated with the Sacramento Police Department for more than 15 years as a prosecutor and judge, is trying for a new and better job.

He is campaigning for the Superior Court bench in a three-way race against Superior Judge James H. Oakley and Attorney Otis D. Babcock, former Sacramento County District Attorney.

JUDGE MCDONNELL

Since June, 1940, McDonnell has served as a jurist in Sacramento. He was city prosecutor before his appointment as police judge. When the voters approved the municipal court in 1943 he was selected to the bench and won a six-year term. He was unopposed for reelection in 1949.

In his capacity as judge of Department 1 of the Municipal Court he handles all misdemeanor cases presented by the police department and many of the felony preliminary hearings.

Many honors have come to Judge McDonnell since he ascended the bench. In 1948 his court tied for first place with Tulsa, Okla., in cities throughout the nation with populations of from 100,000 to 200,000 in a traffic court contest. Sacramento and Tulsa were selected from more than 200 cities for improvements in traffic court procedures and for effectiveness in aiding the cause of highway safety.

The State Judicial Council has selected him on several occasions to sit on the Superior Court bench in nearby counties.

In 1952 Judge McDonnell was selected as one of 26 judges who served on a state judicial council committee which studied ways and means of improving the administration of justice in traffic cases.

He also has served as a member of the subcommittee on pretrial court procedure of the State Judicial Council.

And only last month he was a member of a panel which discussed traffic court procedure at the University of Southern California under the sponsorship of the university's school of law, the American Bar Association and the Traffic Institute of Northwestern University.

Judge McDonnell's friends in the law enforcement field are wishing him luck in his campaign, and many are working for him. One of his chief supporters is Mervin H. Reith, former Sacramento City Prosecutor.

Whether he wins or loses, he still will be on the bench. His municipal court term does not run out this year.

RIGHT READING

It is not uncommon for the motor car owner to make the error of taking a hydrometer reading of the battery just after the electrolytic solution has been replenished with water, points out the National Automobile Club. At such time the acid and water have not mixed and the gravity reading is bound to be incorrect. The proper time to take note of the charge is after the car has been run for several hours and the solution has had time to integrate.

SLOW DOWN

Slow down after the sun goes down, advises the National Automobile Club.

"There's still nothing wrong with the old reflexes. Notice the neat way I avoided that joker in the car back there?"

JUVENILE CONVENTION

Juvenile law enforcement interest throughout the state centered on Sacramento early this year when the fifth annual California State Juvenile Officers Association convention was held there.

For Captain Frank H. Gessner, head of the Sacramento Police Department Juvenile Division, this was an especially momentous occasion, inasmuch as he was one of the organizers of the state association.

And, thanks in great part to the efforts of Captain Gessner, who with Police Chief James V. Hicks and Juvenile Officer Francis E. Gregory, was a cochairman, the convention has been hailed as a prototype at which future conventions may well aim.

Held March 24th, 25th and 26th, the confab featured such outstanding speakers as Richard A. McGee, director of the state department of corrections; Heman G. Stark, director of the California Youth Authority, and Attorney General Edmund G. (Pat) Brown. McGee appeared in place of Governor Goodwin J. Knight who was unable to attend due to the press of state business.

Particularly valuable to the 117 delegates were the panel discussions which covered such topics as "Rights and Responsibilities for Juveniles," "Liquor Enforcement at Juvenile Levels," "Female Juveniles as a Police Problem," and "Juvenile Gangs—Their Cause and Control."

The Northern California Juvenile Officers Association was host to the Central Valley and Southern California Juvenile Officers Associations. Before scattering to their respective cities, the delegates chose Santa Monica as next year's convention site and elected new officers. The new officers include Komer Dyal of the San Bernardino Police Department, president; John Huddelston of the Concord Police Department, secretary-treasurer, and A. J. Lauder of the Fresno Police Department, sergeant at arms. The board of directors consists of Harold Stockridge of Los Angeles, Jack Ford of Merced, Peter Bolhick of San Mateo, Katherine Williams of Taft, Leon Green of San Jose, and Dick Frazier of Glendale.

Gessner was instrumental in the formation of the state association which had its birth at a meeting in Asilomar in 1948. For this reason he was particularly pleased to see Sacramento have an opportunity to be the host city.

Prior to the 1948 meeting the Northern and Southern and Central Valley associations were separate organizations.

Gessner was one of six men who met to lay the groundwork of the state organization. Today the association numbers some 600 members throughout the state.

Practically all of Gessner's law enforcement career has been spent in juvenile work. The first six months after his appointment to the police department were spent in the detective bureau. He then was placed in the juvenile bureau as a night man and to supervise taxi dance girls who at that time were required to register with the juvenile bureau.

In 1937 Gessner was picked as the man to inaugurate the city's new bicycle licensing program. He got the system rolling and remained with it for a year before being transferred to the major crime and pawnshop details in the detective bureaus. Gessner was named head of the juvenile division in 1947.

A native Sacramentan, Gessner has been active in community affairs for many years. His fraternal activities include a past presidency of the Sunset Parlor, Native Sons of the Golden West and membership in the Masons. He also is a 32nd degree Scottish Rites Mason and a past president of the Northern California Juvenile Officers Association.

Sports followers remember Gessner as a member of two state champion basketball teams in the 1920's. In 1922 he travelled to Kansas City, Kans., with an American Legion champion team to compete in regional finals.

SENSIBLE DRIVING

Use all your senses when you're driving. See what's ahead. Listen for warning signals. Feel trouble, like faulty steering or bad brakes. Smell trouble brewing, like raw gas or dangerous fumes. Then develop your sixth sense—good judgment—and give full time and attention to your driving, says the California State Automobile Association. In this way, you'll avoid senseless accidents.

FLAWS AND QUIRKS

A motor vehicle enlarges the driver's personality, says the California State Automobile Association. That is the reason little flaws and quirks of a person's character become more manifest when they are magnified into the behavior of a few tons of steel moving in an unsafe or irregular manner at "x" miles per hour. Practice sportsmenlike driving and it will improve your character, your reputation and the public safety. In short, everybody gains.

STILL ON TRAIL

Killers sometimes think when they get away with their crimes for a time the heat dies down and they are safe.

But if the murderer of Francis M. (Jack) Rea, North Sacramento police officer thinks he is safe because more than four months have gone by since the killing and he still hasn't been caught, he should think again.

Police Chief William Wilson, Assistant Chief Percy Gassaway, and the other members of the department still are examining every lead, no matter how remote, determined to track down the killer if it takes the rest of their lives.

Gassaway, who was working with Rea the night of January 2nd when the slaying took place, was placed in personal charge of the investigation and still is working at it. Hundreds, in fact thousands, of clues have been sifted and more than a dozen possible suspects have been arrested and released.

So far, unfortunately, the right clue has not been turned up. The killer was burglarizing a warehouse in North Sacramento when Rea and Gassaway surprised him. In a running gun battle which followed, a fatal bullet hit Rea. The slayer escaped, but even if he still is running, the North Sacramento police are determined to get him some day.

The people of North Sacramento, in a spontaneous demonstration of their liking for Rea, who was familiarly known as Jack the Cop, raised nearly $4,000 and gave it to Mrs. Rea to apply to the mortgage on the family home.

FRITZ NOW FOREMAN

Fritz Kaminsky, who retired as chief of the Sacramento Police Department last November, has taken up new duties as foreman of the Federal Grand Jury for Sacramento County.

Federal Judge Dal M. Lemmon appointed Kaminsky to the position last month.

The exchief, who served just short of 29 years on the Sacramento Police Department, has been taking things easy since his retirement. As he explained at the time:

"I'm going to take a little vacation and do a lot of fishing."

Kaminsky began his career in the department November 16, 1923, as secretary to the chief. He served under seven chiefs and climbed through the ranks, serving as a patrolman, superintendent of the traffic department, captain, head of the juvenile bureau, chief of detectives and assistant chief. He served as chief from March 16, 1951, until his retirement.

TWO MILLION TOLL

The worst automobile accident toll in the nation's history—more than two million casualties—was recorded in 1953, according to figures released by The Travelers Insurance Companies.

Traffic deaths totaled 38,500, an increase of 900 over 1952. The injury count reached 2,140,000 compared to 2,090,000 for the previous year.

The totals are statistics from "The Passing Scene," twentieth in an annual series of traffic accident data booklets published by the The Travelers. Accident facts from every state in the country are collected and analyzed for the publication by Travelers statisticians.

Excessive speed was the most dangerous driving mistake in 1953. Speed killed 13,870 persons and injured more than 600,000. Drivers under 25 years of age were involved in almost 25 per cent of the year's fatal accidents although they constitute only about 15 per cent of the total of all drivers.

Week end crashes accounted for 15,800 killed and 600,000 hurt during 1953. Forty-one per cent of the deaths and 36 per cent of the injuries occurred on Saturdays and Sundays last year.

The pedestrian record reflected the third consecutive year of improvement. Booklet figures show pedestrian casualties reduced by 50 to 8,600. Crossing between intersections, "jay walking," still is the chief cause of pedestrian deaths and injuries.

"The Passing Scene" also reports that three out of four 1953 auto accidents happened to passenger cars driving in clear weather on dry roads.

Eighty per cent of vehicles involved in fatal accidents were traveling straight ahead.

Saturday was the most dangerous day of the week to drive.

1953 was the fourth consecutive year of increase in the death toll.

DRIVER ANALYSIS

Do you think of yourself as a person, but of the other driver as just a motor vehicle—an inanimate moving force? Even on the occasions when the other "car" shows "you" a courtesy, do you frequently fail to let the "other driver" know that "your car" appreciates the courtesy? The California State Automobile Association advises that, for safety's sake, you should firmly fix in your mind that all other automobiles, like yours, represent the human beings inside them and are not just inanimate moving forces.

CAUTION SIGN

A child near the street is a caution sign.

California Highway Patrol Commissioner B. R. Caldwell said that any child playing near a street or highway should be an automatic warning signal to motorists to slow down and proceed with caution.

"The greatest single killer of children under 15 years of age in our country today is the traffic accident," Caldwell declared.

Pointing out that children are usually willing to follow the example of others, Caldwell said that a youngster who exhibits a disregard of traffic regulations often mirrors the training or lack of training that he has received in the home. Careless habits in walking, wild play in moving cars or leaning out car windows always reflect a lack of proper safety training in children.

"It is the responsibility of every parent to educate children to the dangers that are always present in traffic," Caldwell said. "It is equally important that these same parents practice safe driving and walking behavior that will save the lives of unwary youngsters. Failure of too many motorists to stop for flashing red lights on school buses and disregard of speed limits all take a tragic annual toll in young lives."

CHECK YOUR CAR

Check your car, check accidents; and do it now for tomorrow may be too late.

In offering this suggestion to California motorists, Commissioner B. R. Caldwell of the California Highway Patrol reminded that May is the month for special emphasis on vehicle maintenance throughout the nation.

"Previous voluntary Safety Checks have uncovered at least one faulty condition in order to lawfully operate on the streets and highways of the state," Caldwell pointed out.

He advised every motor vehicle owner and operator to give himself the following test:

"Can I see, steer and stop safely?"

"Such a test," Caldwell explained, "will cause drivers to check mirrors, window glass, windshield wipers, lights, steering mechanisms, wheels, brakes and tires. If these items, together with the horn and exhaust system, are in safe condition the vehicle should be ready for road use.

"It is inexcusable negligence to operate an unsafe vehicle," he admonished.

PERMANENT REST

Practically all of us look forward to the week-end as a time for rest and pleasure. We can catch up on our golf game, work around the house and have some fun with the children. It's the time for going to church, watching television, listening to the ball game or visiting or being visited by friends.

The week-ends are all of those things—except on the highways. In 1953, 15,800 persons were killed and 800,000 were injured in week-end accidents, according to figures compiled and recently released by The Travelers Insurance Companies. Forty-one per cent of the deaths and 36 per cent of the injuries were recorded on Saturdays and Sundays in 1953.

Saturday continued to be the most dangerous day of the week. One reason is that more cars are in use Saturday than on any weekday. There is another distinguishing feature which sets this day apart from the others. For too many people, Saturday night is a time when drinking and driving combine. No one knows exactly how many traffic accidents are caused by drinking drivers but everyone knows it is a major problem. Everyone needs to know that even one drink before driving is too many.

Week-ends indeed are a time of rest. For too many they are the beginnings of permanent rest.

YOU CAN HELP

Will you help save 38,500 lives in 1954 and help stop needless injury to 2,140,000 persons?

If the above strikes you as an unusual challenge you need to read a booklet we just received from The Travelers Insurance Companies. Entitled, "The Passing Scene," it is their annual publication of traffic accident data in which statisticians have analyzed the traffic safety picture in 1953.

You would learn that 38,500 people were killed and 2,140,000 were injured by motor vehicle accidents last year. Leafing through the booklet you would find out why 1953 made tragic history as the most disastrous year for traffic accidents ever experienced.

The report makes it clear that most of last year's accidents need not have happened. Most of them were caused by drivers and pedestrians who could have prevented the circumstances which led them to disaster.

The conclusion is clear and the challenge is unavoidable. Only those who do the driving and walking can keep the traffic problem under control.

THE FACT SHEET

THE PROBLEM: SPEED

The biggest traffic problem this month is unsafe speed. The solution to this problem lies in convincing drivers that the only safe speed is a speed determined by prevailing conditions... and that the only intelligent speed is a safe speed.

For safety's sake, a good driver doesn't travel at the same rate of speed when driving in snow, rain or darkness as he does when driving on a bright, sunny day. Similarly, when he's not feeling up to par or when he knows his car is not in top condition, he drives slower than he does when both he and his car are in the pink. He also slows down on rough or narrow roads.

Letting conditions determine the speed at which a vehicle is driven is not only common sense, it's the law. In every state a driver is liable to arrest if he is driving at a speed that is not safe under prevailing conditions (even though he may be traveling at a speed well under the posted limit).

Another argument for driving at a speed safe for conditions is that such driving is economical. The driver who travels at a sensible rate of speed uses less gas and oil than the fellow who burns up the road, and his tires do not wear out as fast.

SPEED AND THE LAW

All states have enacted legislation to cope with the problem of speed. Although speed regulations vary with locality, the traffic laws of all states include the basic rule that motorists must drive at speeds that are reasonable and safe under prevailing conditions.

Disregard of such laws is a leading factor in traffic accidents.

Twenty-eight per cent of the drivers in fatal accidents in 1952 were violating a speed law. Seventeen per cent were exceeding stated speed limits, and eleven per cent were exceeding safe speeds although traveling at less than the speed limit or were on a road where no stated limit existed.

Because many fatal accidents involve two vehicles, the number of accidents is fewer than the total number of drivers involved. Speed violations were a factor in 35 per cent of fatal accidents.

REGULATION GOVERNING MAXIMUM SPEED

In traveling about the country, a driver will encounter three types of speed regulations governing maximum speed.

1. Posted Speed Limits — Signs are erected at frequent intervals stating the speed limit. The limit may be a general one for the area, or a special limit for a short zone. The driver must remember that these limits have been determined on the basis of what is considered safe speed for normal conditions. They do not necessarily apply when weather, road or other conditions are not normal. Some states have established one speed limit for daytime driving and a different speed limit for night driving in the same area. (See "Uniform Speed Regulations" below.)

2. Established Speed Limit — Not Posted—In some jurisdictions, little or no effort is made to erect frequent signs advising the driver of the speed limit. A limit exists, however, in the laws of the state or community and is just as much in effect as if posted. The driver has the responsibility of learning and obeying the limit. He must remember also that the limit represents the maximum under favorable conditions.

3. No Established or Posted Speed Limit—In some areas there are no established or posted speed limits. The law merely states that you must drive at speeds that are reasonable and safe under prevailing conditions. All states include this basic rule in their traffic laws, even though a stated limit is also set forth in the law. (See "Uniform Speed Regulations" below.)

UNIFORM VEHICLE CODE

A constant effort is being made to bring about uniformity in traffic laws. Many states have revised their traffic legislation to conform with the Uniform Vehicle Code, and conformity with this code is recommended by bay area Chapters of the National Safety Council to improve traffic legislation.

Act V, Article VI, Uniform Vehicle Code, Speed Restrictions, provides:

"Section 56. Special restrictions — (a) No person shall drive a vehicle on a highway at a speed greater than is reasonable and prudent under the conditions and having regard to the actual and potential hazards then existing. In every event speed shall be so controlled as may be necessary to avoid colliding with any person, vehicle, or other conveyance on or entering the highway in compliance with legal requirements and the duty of all persons to use due care.

"(b) Where no special hazard exists that requires lower speed for compliance with paragraph (a) of this section the speed of any vehicle not in excess of the limits specified in this section or established as hereinafter authorized shall be lawful, but any speed in excess of the limits specified in this section or established as hereinafter authorized shall be prima facie evidence that the speed is not reasonable or prudent and that it is unlawful:

SPEED AND SAFETY

Since many factors enter into the making of every accident, it is impossible to give accurate statistics on the relationship between speed and traffic accidents. However, there are two facts that are significant in any consideration of this question.

1. The first is that a speeding car travels a greater distance between the time the brakes are applied and the time the car stops than a slow-moving vehicle travels in the same time. Obviously, a driver's chances of not hitting an object that suddenly looms in his path increases as his speed decreases.

 braking distances for the best theoretical performance with four-wheel brakes (performance that is theoretical and never achieved under actual conditions) that could be made in a laboratory—the and average distances. The first braking distance column represents the best stops second set of distances, about what the average car on the average road will do.

Speed m.p.h.	Lab. tests Min. braking dis.—feet	Road tests Aver. braking dis.—feet
20	13.4	21
30	30	47
40	53.6	84
50	83.8	131
60	120.6	189
70	164.2	257
80	214.4	336

2. The second significant fact is that, according to the laws of physics, energy is proportional to the square of the speed. In other words, if you double your speed, you'll hit four times as hard. This can be an important factor in the severity of an accident. The following examples illustrate this point:

A car striking a fixed obstacle at 20 miles per hour will suffer the same damage it would if it dropped from a height of 13 feet onto a concrete highway.

At 40 miles per hour the damage would be the same as if the car were dropped from a 4-story building.

At 50 miles per hour the same is if the car were dropped from a 7-story building.

At 60 miles per hour the same as if the car were dropped from a 10-story building.

SPEED AND ECONOMY

In addition to the legal and safety aspects of speed there is a third aspect that concerns all drivers. This is the relative expense of speed.

Recent tests, conducted by the National Safety Council and other agencies, comparing a top cruising speed of 65 miles per hour with one of 40 miles per hour, showed the higher speed to be much more costly.

Gas consumption per mile increased 30 per cent at the higher speed and the number of brake applications and braking time increased 50 per cent. Tire wear was two and a half times as great. When speed was stepped up, oil consumption per mile increased even more than gas consumption.

Tests over city routes comparing top speeds of 25 and 35 miles per hour showed that 20 per cent more gas was consumed at the 35 mile per hour speed than at the 25 mile per hour speed.

FARM SAFETY WEEK

"There are signs that farm people are becoming more aware of the need to work and live safely," said Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson, in calling for support of the 11th National Farm Safety Week, July 25-31. "Participation in last year's National Safety Week convinced me of that. That is why I urge all farm residents to join in, or start, a local version of the national Farm To Live—Live To Farm campaign. Safety, like charity, begins at home."

Other farm leaders join in asking for support of the 11th National Farm Safety Week. Statements follow:

Senator George Aiken, chairman of the Senate Agricultural Committee: "Home Safety Day of the 11th National Farm Safety Week appeals to me as the time for thinking about the fact that one out of every four farm persons killed in accidents are killed in the home. I would like to see every farm child receive an all-around safety lesson during the Week. Don't let tragedy hit your child for lack of knowledge of the right way to live to farm."

Representative Clifford Hope, chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture: "It is interesting to me to note that 6,000 of the 14,000 farm residents killed in accidents last year were killed in motor vehicle accidents. This points up the necessity for observing the third of the National Safety Council's Ten Commandments for Safe Living: KNOW AND OBEY TRAFFIC LAWS. I believe that National Farm Safety Week is worthwhile for teaching that lesson alone."

Allan B. Kline, president, American Farm Bureau Federation: "Observation of National Farm Safety Week serves to emphasize that farm people still suffer a high proportion of unnecessary losses from fires and accidents. Safety is an individual responsibility. Each of us must make a contribution to reduction of fire and accident hazards in order to make American farms safer, more efficient and happier places to live."

Herschel D. Newsom, master, National Grange: "Accidents kill about 38 farm residents each day according to the latest figures. Think of that many funerals each day during 1954! Doesn't such a toll emphasize the need for everyone who lives on a farm to take a personal interest in making every farm safety campaign a success? Farm folk who farm to live must truly live to farm."

James G. Patton, president, National Farmers Union: "I am sure each of the National Safety Council's Ten Commandments for Safe Living on the Farm can save lives, but in this modern age, I'd place special emphasis on the First Commandment: 'Keep Machines in Good Repair, and Keep All Guards and Safety Devices in Place.' If every farm man did this, I'm sure the toll of 14,000 dead each year would be greatly reduced."

LIVE TO FARM

In proclaiming the 11th National Farm Safety Week for July 25-31, 1954, President Eisenhower suggested the theme he first made popular in 1953—"Farm To Live—Live to Farm"

The United States Department of Agriculture and the National Safety Council, as co-sponsors of the Week, welcome the theme from the 10th observance because of its success in encouraging farm residents to practice safety in the home, at work, in traffic and elsewhere to a greater degree than any other theme.

"Now that the National Safety Council is operating under a charter granted by the Congress of the United States, the Council should be able to work more effectively than ever with all organizations interested in reducing accidents on the farms in America," said Ned H. Dearborn, president of the National Safety Council.

"The 11th National Farm Safety Week will be a good test of this increased efficiency," Mr. Dearborn said.

"Indications are that 31 states will have active Farm Safety Week committees this year, as compared with 28 in 1953," said Maynard H. Coe, director of the Farm Division of the National Safety Council. "Moreover, 16 of the cooperating states will have State Farm Safety Specialists, as compared with 12 last year."

"I urgently request all farm residents to make every effort to develop safe work habits and skills, so that they may 'Farm to live—and live to farm'," said the Presidential Proclamation. "I also request all persons and organizations interested in farm life and welfare to join in the campaign to free as many homes as possible from the tragedies and losses caused by needless accidents."

Two hours after the hunt got underway the dead rabbits were collected by jeep and truck. Many of them were given away to persons who gathered at the airport when they learned the hunt was in progress.

In addition to reducing the jack population at the airport, the shoot served another purpose. Hicks and his men got some quick fire practice with their riot guns.

SAFETY BUS

Watch for the California Highway Patrol safety bus in your locality.

Latest addition to the Patrol's safety education program is a recently acquired mobile safety education unit which is now making its way around the state.

The unit is housed in a converted commuter-type bus made available to the Patrol as a public service by the Pacific Greyhound Lines and will be operated by Patrol personnel.

This bus contains numerous testing devices designed to measure the driving skills of motorists.

"These devices are purely educational and for the information of the individual. No performance records of any kind are kept by the Highway Patrol," emphasized Patrol Commissioner B. R. Caldwell.

Other features of the safety education bus include accident photos, safe driving tips, and traffic law information.

While the bus has only recently been placed in action, it has already been booked solid through October.

PEDESTRIAN HAZARD

More than 60 per cent of the persons killed in San Francisco traffic during the past decade have been killed while walking across a street. Iver C. Larson, executive vice president of the San Francisco Chapter, National Safety Council, said recently.

"So far this year 18 persons have been struck and fatally injured on the streets of this city. This compared with 13 who have died in cars as the result of crashes," Larson noted.

"Constant care is necessary when crossing any street. A momentary lapse can cause an accident in a hurry. If pedestrians would LOOK for approaching cars; THINK for their own safety; and CROSS only at lawful places in a sensible manner, the traffic congestion and snarls in the downtown area and the accidents in the residential areas would be effectively reduced," the Safety Council official said.

Larson warned pedestrian violators that they face a $2.00 fine if they are apprehended in the downtown area.

"People living in the residential areas—where most of the fatalities occur—should cooperate with the police department for their own safety and to set a good example for children. Jaywalking and crossing against signal lights are senseless violations—always the top killers in traffic," he stated.

In 1953, 269,360 pedestrians were injured in U.S. traffic accidents.

BLASTING CAPS

Blasting caps sometimes are lost or stolen and boys and girls find them. While playing with these caps, explosions frequently occur, and as a result hundreds have been hurt. Some lose fingers and hands, some are blinded for life. Blasting caps are small copper or aluminum cylinders about as big around as a lead pencil and between 1½ inches and 5 inches long. They contain a highly sensitive explosive and are used to explode dynamite, to mine coal and metals, quarry stone, and build bridges, roads, and skyscrapers.

There are two kinds of caps. The "ordinary cap" is exploded by sparks from a burning fuse inserted in one end of the cap. The other kind of cap is an electric blasting cap. It has two wires coming out of one end. These two wires are connected by a very thin wire that is sunk in the explosive charge in the cap. When electric current is applied, the thin wire becomes red hot and detonates the cap.

The explosives in blasting caps are very sensitive, so that they will be sure to detonate the dynamite charge. An experienced person knows how to handle them safely. In the hands of an inexperienced person they are extremely dangerous.

Comparatively few persons know what a blasting cap looks like; children particularly are likely to play with them.

When a cap explodes, hundreds of small pieces of metal fly out in all directions—sometimes as much as 200 feet—and even at that distance could cause blindness.

Boys and girls should know what a blasting cap looks like, and what great damage it can do. If found it should be left alone. Other boys and girls should be warned and a report made to a fireman, policeman, sheriff, or other law enforcement officer. He will dispose of it properly.

Unless officers are thoroughly experienced in the way to handle such explosives without endangering themselves or others:

1. Get in touch with the county agricultural agent.
2. Call the area headquarters of any major quarrying, mining, or construction project.
3. Contact a representative of the U. S. Bureau of Mines, or
4. Get in touch with a representative of an explosives manufacturer.

Last year's traffic toll of deaths and injuries was the heaviest in history.

In 1953, 8,600 pedestrians were killed in U. S. traffic accidents.

A Candle, A Spoon... A Gun

By WALTER R. HECOX

He was a medium sized man, about five feet nine inches tall and a hundred and fifty pounds. His eyes were dark with closely contracted pupils, and his hands shook a little every time he raised the damp end of his cigarette to his mouth and all his movements were tight, nervous gestures. He had trouble, plenty of trouble, and he knew it so he talked freely.

A long time ago he had learned that if you told the police what they wanted to know in a spot like this your trouble might not be so bad. Maybe they would let him alone.

He was on the stuff and they knew he was on it, but he did not have any with him and they had not found any, so he was in the clear for a while at least. But he was hooked and hooked good, and when a man is like that he has to have his daily ration of snow. If he didn't talk and they hounded him, sooner or later they would find the stuff and take it away from him and he could not imagine anything worse. A man who is hooked like that suffers when they take his heroin supply away. He suffers more than anyone can imagine. The drug wears off and a million tiny nerve endings come to life and catch fire and nothing will help the excruciating agony which follows except more heroin.

So the dark, nervous man talked. He told Inspectors Max Girard and Dennis Bradley of the San Francisco Police Department Robbery Detail everything he could, which was not much but seemed to be enough. They were not interested in narcotics. Robbery was their specialty and while they had another job in mind when they contacted the dark man he had touched on a more important matter. He knew a little about a series of Safeway Store holdups which had baffled and irritated San Francisco Bay Area police for some time.

He knew the name of a man, Harold Miller, and his blond girl friend, who bore the name, if not the habits of a Greek goddess. There was the fact that the girl was driving a bright red Studebaker with a black top which was so new that the permanent license plates had not arrived yet. He did not know Miller's address or the girl's either for that matter, but he did know the vicinity she lived in. Just the general area within a block or so. It was just a crumb of information, but enough.

When they were satisfied that they had dragged all the available information from the dark man Girard and Bradley withdrew for a brief conference. They talked for a short time, then turned to the informer.

"We'd like you to stay close to home. There are other officers who know more about these cases than we do. We want them to talk to you."

The dark man let a sigh of relief escape from the tense lips and nodded. "Anything you want. Anything at all."

Within the hour Girard and Bradley were back in their headquarters on the fourth floor of the massive, brownstone Hall of Justice discussing their information with Lieutenant Martin Lee, head of the Robbery Detail, and two Inspectors, Jules Zimmerlin and George Heeg.

"This Miller could be a hot suspect," Girard concluded. "He fits the description of the holdup man pretty well and he owns a blue 1949 Buick and a 1938 Ford."

Zimmerlin nodded. "We've been looking for him. He just finished doing a year in the county jail for second degree robbery last summer. He's a hophead and he must be getting money for the stuff. The descriptions of him and his Buick fit the pattern, even if he did use a handkerchief over his face. But two weeks ago he just disappeared. We haven't been able to get a line on him."

"Maybe his pal will help," Lee suggested. "Let's make a date with him."

It was 7:30 p.m. on October 7, 1953 when Inspectors Girard, Heeg, Zimmerlin, and Bradley met the dark eyed informer and accompanied him to the Crocker-Amazon district.

"She lives around here somewhere," he told the officers. "I don't know exactly where, but we ought to see the car if she's home."

The ultra streamlined, bright red Studebaker was easy to spot and the temporary paper license plates pasted to the rear window of the car revealed the girl's address. Bradley and Girard took the informer home, while Heeg and Zimmerlin proceeded to Ingleside Police Station where a quick check revealed the girl had been arrested recently on a narcotics charge and was free on bail while awaiting trial.

"She should be easy to reason with," Heeg remarked. "She's in enough of a jam to make her want to cooperate."

Zimmerlin nodded. "These hopheads are never too tough."

Ten minutes later the two inspectors were talking to a willowy blond, a namesake of the ancient goddess of the dawn, whose youthful beauty had become hard and cold beneath the carefully applied layer of pancake makeup.

"Sure I know Harold Miller," she admitted. "He's a nice guy."

PISTOL POINTING

By ROSS DUNNIGAN

Perhaps the first thing I do this time is to explain just why the March matches were called off at San Francisco. Many people have asked me in the past few weeks so I think all should know. It's very simple. The back-stop on the 50 yard line has been taking such a beating in the last 9 or 10 years it has kinda worn down in spots and the lead catcher has not been able to get all the bullets with the result that some of the lead was flying back to the shooters and giving the boys a bit of hot lead during the matches. All has been fixed now and as you know the matches were held in April as scheduled.

So now to the matches in Oakland on May 2, '54. (Sunday) And another record day can be chalked up for the Oakland Club as it was the first day of trout season and in spite of the crazy fishermen there were 225 shooters on the lot for the day's outing plus the usual assortment of wives, kids and dogs.

Cap Boomhower, of the Hiway Patrol, fooled the boys by getting his limit Saturday morning at his private fishin' hole where he got the limit in two hours. Honest, that's what the man said!

Vic Vignola of the Oakland Club is one of those hard working guys that all clubs have—but don't appreciate. Vic fixes broken plumbing, bum wiring, busted boards, backstops and all sorts of gadgets that go wrong in any club. Vic does it with a smile and actually gets a kick out of helping out in his own way. But what I started to say was that Vic has been shooting pretty good scores with a gun handed down to him by his great, great grandfather and has often wished for a more modern weapon—say, like one made about 1900 or so then maybe he would shoot better scores. The boys from the Oakland Club got together and bought him a new 1954 model .38 revolver and made the presentation last Sunday. At first Vic thought it was some sort of a joke but soon the light dawned in his noggin and was he happy? How would you have felt under the same circumstances? Well, Vic, you can now put the old blunderbus back in the museum.

Another of our regulars was Frank Lipold who brought along his 6 year old daughter. Frank and the youngster were having a swell time sitting on the benches playing paddy-cake, paddy-cake, baker's man. Later Frank confided that the kid had the right idea and he should have listened to her when she wanted Frank to stay and finish the game.

Now some folks would find a good, clean moral to this tale but to me it's just another way of a guy trying to put up a good alibi. Ed Roseberg claimed that he hadn't cleaned his gun in over a year so the nite before the matches he most carefully cleaned and pressed his shootin' irons. Comes the matches and

PUBLIC HONORS SAFETY PATROLS

In massed formation, the 4,500 members of the San Francisco School Safety Patrol await the start of the parade in Kezar Stadium.

Bay Area police departments and the California Highway Patrol were represented at the annual review of San Francisco's School Safety Patrol. Left to right: first row, Inspector A. J. Ford, Captain J. W. Kennedy, Captain Ted Parnow, Inspector Fred Leber, California Highway Patrol; Officer Eugene Baroni, Richmond; W. A. Hutchins, Oakland Office, California State Automobile Association. Second row, Officer Henry Sundermann, Daly City; Lieutenant Harold Richardson, Oakland; Officer E. B. Ayres, California Highway Patrol; Captain Wyman Vernon, Lieutenant Howard Sorrells, Oakland; Captain Earl Fitch, Richmond; Vaughn Seidel, Alameda County School Superintendent; James Bunker, formerly of the Alameda County School Department. Third row, Sergeant George A. Rennacker, Sergeant W. D. Hoyt, Officer Paul Hurych, Berkeley; Officer Ray Morris, El Cerrito; Officer Earl McKinnon, San Mateo; Nelson Vassallo and Earl Mennet Alameda County School Department.

Parades and reviews of School Safety Patrols, the young guardians of the crosswalks who are trained by local police officers and highway patrolmen, were staged in many cities during the closing weeks of the school term.

Public ceremonies honoring the accident-prevention records of the boys and girls took place in San Francisco, Oakland, Berkeley, Livermore, El Cerrito, Richmond, Stockton, San Rafael, Burlingame and San Mateo. Other events such as picnics, trips and outings were held for School Patrols in many other communities.

School Safety Patrols number some 600,000 in nationwide membership with northern and central California totalling 30,000 School Patrol boys and girls. Police Departments in cities and the California Highway Patrol in rural areas supervise the training of the School Safety Patrols and join with the School Departments, Parent-Teacher organizations and the California State Automobile Association in sponsoring this outstanding youth-safety movement.

The following cities reported events honoring the Patrols:

San Francisco School Safety Patrols marched in their annual Parade and Review in Kezar Stadium, June 2, marking their thirty-first anniversary.

Some 4,500 boys and girls representing 131 public, parochial and private schools paraded before city officials, civic leaders, representatives of the Police Department, the School Department, Parent-Teacher groups, the California State Automobile Association, and thousands of the general public.

The San Francisco Patrol has a record of not one school child killed at a patrol-

TRACY RUNS ON RECORD

Sheriff Joseph B. Tracy is campaigning for re-election to the combined office of Sheriff-Coroner, to which he was elected four years ago after several years of service as Deputy United States Marshal of the Fresno District. Tracy said he will base his candidacy strictly on his record in office. He is opposed by Melvin Willmirth, superintendent of the Fresno County Jail farm.

Tracy's statement follows:

"Four years ago I pledged myself to devote my full time to the office of Sheriff-Coroner, if elected, and I have carried out that pledge. Aside from trips out of the County, for the most part on official business, and a few short vacation trips, I have been on call twenty-four hours a day.

"My campaign program four years ago was based on five main points, and I have carried out every one of them.

"First, I promised to tighten the security of our County Jail. This has been accomplished by frequent inspections and by taking away from the trustees the keys to the tanks which they formerly carried. Moreover, telephones have been installed so that prisoners may make one personal call at the time of arrest.

"Second, I promised to provide better food for our prisoners, and more vegetables at no extra cost. This has been accomplished. Formerly prisoners were fed only twice a day, and had nothing to eat between dinner at 3 o'clock in the afternoon and breakfast at 6:30 o'clock the next morning. Now we give them nourishing soup and bread at 6:30 o'clock in the evening. Juveniles are fed three times daily, under supervision, in the kitchen dining room.

"My third promise was that I would establish a Crime Prevention Bureau to handle juveniles. This was accomplished some six months after I took office. The first full year, 1952, saw the handling of 1,109 cases, involving 1,771 persons. Of this number 1,390 were juveniles, including 900 boys and 490 girls. Of these youngsters, 590 were under 14 years of age, ranging up to 216 at age 16.

"It may be a surprise to some that, of the 1,771 individuals handled by this bureau, 1,682 were of the white race, including 347 of Mexican descent; 67 were Negroes and 22 were Asiatic. Some 589 came from broken homes; 186 were repeaters. Of these cases there were 187 on which petitions were filed or certified; 284 were given voluntary probation; 249 were transferred, and with 1,051 action was suspended or the individual was dismissed. We are justly proud in the Sheriff's Office of the Crime Prevention Bureau, which has received much commendation.

"The fourth point in my program was physical examination and F.B.I. training for Sheriff's deputies. All applicants for deputyships now receive complete physical examinations when they are selected from the lists. We have had two F.B.I. schools on general investigation and report writing, one on defense tactics, and one on the use of firearms. We have also had first-aid training by the Red Cross for all deputies, plus civil defense first-aid for all auxiliary officers. We sent two men to the explosives school in Los Angeles and they, in turn, conducted local schools, the first in California. We have been commended by Major General W. M. Robertson, State Director of Civil Defense, for these training programs.

SHERIFF JOSEPH B. TRACY

YOUNGEST POLICE CHIEF

Since the first of February, 1954 the city of Dinuba has claimed the youngest police chief in the State of California to be in charge of a police force consisting of more than four men.

Thirty year old William H. Berlin, Jr., who responds more readily to just plain "Bill", took over the Dinuba department on that date and since then has concentrated on developing one of the most efficient law enforcement agencies in the state.

Berlin, who was born in Santa Cruz, California, was graduated from Santa Cruz High School in 1941 and immediately enlisted in the United States Marines. He served until November 13, 1945, including a 30 month hitch overseas in the Pacific Theater of operations. Ten days after his discharge he joined the Santa Cruz Police Department and served as a radio patrolman, juvenile officer, member of the detective bureau and as Sergeant.

He left the Santa Cruz department in April, 1953 to take over a position with a Fresno insurance company as claims adjuster and investigator and worked there until his appointment as Chief of the Dinuba department.

During his service with the Santa Cruz department Berlin attended more than 18 Federal Bureau of Investigation training schools, was considered the outstanding shot on the police pistol team, has qualified as a fingerprint expert and is qualified to teach criminal law, interrogation, road blocks, burglary investigations, homicide investigation and firearms technique.

His wife, Marjorie is a former Fresno girl. The couple have three children, Loren, Terry and Trudy. Berlin is a member of the Dinuba Rotary Club.

His first move on joining the department was to change the uniforms to full tropical worsted shirt and trousers, green jackets and a red stripe on the sleeve, a uniform which, for some strange reason, reminds one faintly of the USMC. All personnel are now sporting crew haircuts and must be clean shaven. (We have no data on reveille, mess call, retreat or taps. Hafta check with Chief Berlin.)

The population of Dinuba is estimated at about 6500 within one and one half square miles with an additional 6,000 living within a three mile radius around the city.

The department includes Chief Berlin, Captain Ben Webb, an 18 year veteran, Sergeant Elmer "Buck" Pence, five years service, Officer Clarence Spier, two years service, Officers Frank Leal and Robert Pizzo and Reserve Officers Robert Collins and Charles Davis.

Mobile equipment includes two patrol units, both equipped with modern three way radio. At present the radio dispatching is taken care of by Fire control, a situation Chief Berlin hopes to improve soon.

DINUBA POLICE DEPARTMENT

SOUSA WINS AGAIN

Carlos A. Sousa, the reformed football coach who became sheriff-coroner of San Joaquin County four years ago, may not be the best peace officer in California, but you will have to look a long time for a better one and, after finding him, it will take an array of Philadelphia lawyers to convince the people of Sousa's home county that anyone can top the local boy.

A lot of people laughed when Sousa, then a recreation director, ran for sheriff back in 1946 but nobody laughed this year when Sousa, after eight years of outstanding service in a post no one thought he had a chance to get, took on all comers and nearly lapped the field while he breezed into a third term of office during the primary elections.

There is ample reason for Sousa's outstanding success. Together with Michael Canlis, who once played football for the Sheriff, he has organized one of the most efficient sheriff's departments in California. Sousa is the type of man whom almost everyone likes on first sight and who builds up a feeling of respect and admiration over a longer acquaintance. He is a man who plays the game fair and who expects his fellow man to and he runs his office on that premise.

When he ran for Sheriff the first time he announced that he would keep his campaign clean and he kept his word.

"I want to win," he declared, "But I want a clean fight. You will not get any name calling or mud slinging from me. There is no need to roll politics in the gutter."

Apparently some contemporary politicians could take a lesson from Sousa, because he has demonstrated that clean politics and a good record in office is what the people in San Joaquin County like.

Sousa had a lot of work to do when he took over the office eight years ago. The old San Joaquin Sheriff's office was efficient, but needed a thorough going over. Modernization was one need. Improved working conditions for the sheriff's deputies and office staff were also needed. Ex-coach Sousa pitched into his new job with vigor.

His first move was to place his entire personnel under civil service and give them a shorter work week. Slowly the wages of his men climbed and the working day shrunk. Today a San Joaquin deputy works a 40 hour week.

Sheriff Sousa's next step was to see that all deputies were dressed in serviceable, neat uniforms. Then he turned his attention to their ability and education. Today every man must take refresher training courses for two weeks every year. These courses include instruction in all phases of peace officer fundamentals and a rundown of new laws. In addition to the extra schooling, every man must take periodic examinations which establish his standing with the force. And the examinations do not stop with the ordinary deputy. Every officer up to and including the rank of captain must take the tests.

As a step toward forwarding with his modernization program, Sheriff Sousa sent his old pupil, Michael Canlis, back to school. Canlis' new alma mater was

DELTA CITY

Stockton, one of many Pacific Coast communities which is bulging at the seams with an expanding population, is unique among cities of comparative size in the State of California due to the fact that it has both agricultural and industrial activities as a reason for its phenomenal growth.

Stockton, located along the fabulously rich San Joaquin River Delta, distributes by truck, rail and ocean-going steamers a wealth of vegetables and fruits. It also boasts dozens of modern plants ranging from small shops with half a dozen hands to the giant American Can Company factory which is located there.

Residents of the city are proud of the outstanding rating their city has as a business center and of the cultural and social status they have attained. They admit nature has helped them and boast that their industrious and far seeing pioneer citizens worked hard and successfully to make their town a perfect combination of agricultural and industrial enterprises.

Jack A. O'Keefe, a rabid baseball fan with a background in police work dating to 1936, took over the Stockton Police Department in 1950 and since then has maintained a department capable of doing a more than ample job of handling Stockton's multiple police problems.

At present Chief O'Keefe is giving the city a high order of law enforcement which ranks second to none in California. He attributes his success to the fact that he is in charge of a loyal and efficient group of peace officers who take pride in their community.

The department is truly a streamlined force following in every detail the latest subuniting approved in the Federal Bureau of Investigation and International Police Administration. This method of having the right protection at the proper place has given Stockton a minimum of crimes against persons and property and made it a city that can boast of few crimes of violence and a small percentage of so called nuisance offenses.

Recruits to the department and promotions within the force are secured through strict civil service examinations and the entire personnel are men in the prime of life.

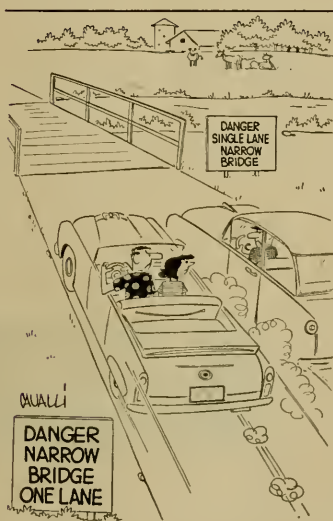

Recruits are trained in the various phases of police activity and the interpretation of department rules and regulations. During the non summer months a program of in service training is carried on for all ranks in the department.

CHIEF J. A. O'KEEFE

The lectures in the non summer course cover patrol procedure, station procedure, public relations, criminal investigation, criminal identification, care and use of firearms, reports and records, communications, criminal law and procedure and target practice.

The traffic division includes a captain, a lieutenant, a sergeant and twenty-five partolmen. Route 99, a main Central California and North South travel artery, calls for continuous service on the part of the traffic division. The seven three wheel motorcycles, five radio cars and six motorcycles assigned to this excellent department unit are busy at all times with parking violations, speeders and others who violate traffic laws or run afoul of the physical laws against the irresistible force meeting the immovable object.

Because of the fact that Stockton always houses a considerable percentage of migratory workers, the detective division including one captain, two lieutenants, ten sergeants and three patrolmen, have a mansized job in holding organized criminal elements out of the city. Their arrest and conviction records are outstanding and though Stockton is a cosmopolitan city, gangsterism is unknown there and petty offenses are at a minimum.

Crime prevention is believed to be of prime importance by Chief O'Keefe. He has discovered that this phase of recognized police efficiency is best effected through specialized attention to the youth of the community and, along this line the Stockton Juvenile Squad has been eminently successful, proving time and again that an ounce of prevention is worth the proverbial pound of cure.

Fourteen years ago Chief O'Keefe married Miss Mary Budiseli. The couple have two children, Marlene, 12, and Johnny, seven.

Within easy distance of the city are excellent fishing and hunting. Bass, both large mouth, small mouth and stripers are the top local favorites along with upland birds and wild duck.

Chief O'Keefe, a man who has lead an active athletic life, concentrates on baseball. He has held the post of Vice President of the Stockton Ports and is an avid fan.

MOANING CAVE

Moaning Cave, located seven miles east of Angels Camp in Calaveras County, is reported by the National Automobile Club to have been named for the weird moaning sound made by the wind when it blows through it. It was discovered by a gold-prospecting Frenchman in 1853.

"We don't think so," Zimmerlin told her. "But we'd like to meet the gentleman."

The girl hesitated. "If he's in trouble I don't want to turn him in. I like the guy."

"You're in trouble yourself," she was reminded. "Plenty of trouble. You've got that to think about."

"Will I get a break if I talk?"

"We can't promise anything. But we'll get Miller sometime. All we want to do is question him. If he's innocent, he'll be all right. If he's guilty he belongs in jail. We'll appreciate your help."

The girl decided discretion was the better part of her peculiar brand of valor. She talked. When she finished she had given the detectives Miller's apartment address and admitted that he had asked her to provide an alibi for him in case he was ever picked up on a holdup charge.

An hour later Bradley and Girard returned and the four inspectors proceeded to the corner of Andover and Park Streets, parked, and moved on foot down Park.

"That ought to be 384 over there," Zimmerlin declared. "His '38 Ford is parked in front of it."

"That's it all right," Heeg agreed. "But no Buick."

Girard shrugged. "All we can do is try. Maybe the Buick is in the garage."

"Someone had better cover the rear entrance," Bradley suggested. "If Miller is in there he may try to duck out the back way."

After a brief huddle the inspectors decided that Zimmerlin and Girard would try the front door while Bradley and Heeg covered the rear. An examination of the premises revealed that the only access to the rear would be through the garage. Zimmerlin and Girard waited while their companions worked on the garage doors. The doors were locked from the inside and stubbornly resisted their attempts to open them. Heeg produced the standard piece of celluloid, but it soon became apparent that the doors were not fastened by an ordinary spring lock.

Bradley worked on the bottom of a door. By reaching with a wire through a recess there he was able to release a spring jam and, after several attempts, to lift a bar which held the double doors closed. They swung open soundlessly as soon as the bar was removed. There was no car in the garage, but Bradley's flashlight focused on a rubble littered passage which led to a rear entrance. He waved to the others and started inside, followed closely by Heeg. The passage took them to a narrow aisle which paralleled the rear of the garage and apartment house, terminating at the rear steps of the building, where it opened into the major portion of the back yard. The two detectives proceeded soundlessly toward the steps with Bradley, flashlight in hand, leading the way.

When Heeg and Bradley disappeared into the garage, Zimmerlin and Girard approached the front door of the apartment house. The doorbell, an instrument of ancient vintage which was supposed to work manually as the result of the twist of an outside knob, proved to be worthless, so the two men rapped on the glass. There was no answer. They waited a respectable time, then knocked again. Still no answer.

Zimmerlin turned to Girard. "What do you think?" he whispered.

"Maybe he's not home, or maybe..." Girard paused and listened intently for a moment. "I think someone's moving around in there. Listen."

He paused in time for the detectives to hear a door close stealthily, almost soundlessly. There was a silence, then the door creaked open. The sound of muffled footsteps moved toward the rear of the building.

"He's taking it on the lam," Girard declared. "Try that door."

The door opened easily and the two inspectors darted toward the rear of the long hall that confronted them. A shot sounded from the back of the building, then another and another. The detectives broke into a full run.

At seven o'clock that evening Harold Miller had been nervous. Part of it was the drug which was getting a good, strong grip on him again. But mostly it was the telephone call he had received a couple of hours earlier. The cops had been asking questions. As close as he could tell they didn't have anything but a hunch, but a hunch was enough. He was hot and he knew it. If they nailed anything on him they had plenty to send him to the big house. Even if they did not get him for a specific stickup there were the dope and his guns. They were enough to send him up for a long stretch.

A man who is on snow gets nervous when he thinks about things like that. They don't give you a ration of stuff in San Quentin. Just thinking about it brings the frayed nerve endings a little closer to the snapping point and makes the hands do a little dance of their own over which the mind has no control. But there is a cure. For a man who is hooked there is always a cure if he can get it.

Miller went to his bureau drawer and procured a candle, a spoon, an eyedropper, some cotton, a hypodermic needle, and a little package of white powder. He worked with speed that comes from experience. First he mixed the powder and cut it. Next he heated it over the candle in the spoon. Finally he transferred it to the eyedropper, then the needle, and at last his arm. When that job was finished he checked his .41 revolver to see that it was properly loaded, pumped a shell into the chamber of his nine millimeter Luger, then replaced it in the clip, slipped off the safeties on both guns, laid them on the bed table, and retired. He started to read, but the fast acting drug soon stopped that. Within minutes he had turned out the light and was sleeping peacefully. Several hours later he heard the knocking on the front door.

Miller left the bed and the .41 left the bed table simultaneously. Cautiously he opened the hall door and peered toward the front portal. Two figures silhouetted against the window which formed the top third of the door told him all he needed to know. Two men wearing snap brim hats and topcoats. Miller found this significant in two ways. First, none of his friends were

FINGERPRINTING
From the book FINGERPRINTS by Douglas G. Browne & Alan Brock. Copyright, 1954, by E. P. Dutton & Co., Inc., Publishers.

Wolsey Crescent and Koomasi Avenue, in the suburb of Hanbury, in South-east London, were laid out, as their names imply, soon after the Ashanti War of the 1870's. Their houses, designed for well-to-do families with at least two servants living in, are detached and double-fronted, with front and back gardens. In the days before two world wars it is probable that these houses were never empty except when the families were on holiday, when the servants were put on board wages and such things as silver and jewelry went to the bank. Times have changed, and now in 1953, though there are still households in Wolsey Crescent and Koomasi Avenue living in comfortable style, they have to make do with a daily maid and a char-woman, and, indeed, feel themselves lucky to get either.

The Harrisons, at Chatsworth, Wolsey Crescent, live in this way. Almost their only link with the past is the habit of sending their valuables to the bank when they go away in August and September. They have—or they had—some good antique silver, and Mrs. Harrison's jewels were valued at £4000. Mr. and Mrs. Harrison are seldom both out in the evening, though their two daughters aged seventeen and nineteen, are then, on the contrary, seldom both at home. It did, however, sometimes occur to Mr. Harrison that in these servantless and lawless days, with the papers full of burglaries and bashings, he really ought to do something about the leaded panes in the front door and in certain windows, particularly the drawing-room window, which overlooked the large back garden. These ornaments, with their colored glass, the pride of the builder in the 1870's, were as good as an invitation to the least skilful burglar. Mr. Harrison's sensible intentions, however, never got beyond putting in screw latches and an extra lock on the front door. After all, either he or his wife was almost always at home in the dark evening hours.

But not quite always; and one evening in February, to celebrate his elder daughter's success in an extremely stiff examination in physiotherapy, the whole family went to the theater. Returning home by Tube, they reached Chatsworth at 11:30, to find that the long-standing invitation to thieves had been accepted. The house had been entered by way of the leaded panes along the top of the drawing-room window, and most of Mrs. Harrison's jewels and smaller pieces of silver taken.

While Mrs. Harrison and the girls were only beginning to find out what had gone, Mr. Harrison ran to the telephone in the hall, grabbed the receiver, and dialed Hanbury 1113. Most Metropolitan police stations are so numbered. Mr. Harrison had heard a good deal about fingerprints, but either he thought that a burglar was not likely to use the telephone, or he did not stop to think at all.

The police station being near at hand, a uniformed inspector, a detective-sergeant in plain clothes, and a constable were at Chatsworth within five minutes. Before the inspector did anything else he asked the family to stop handling things; he did not waste breath in reproving Mr. Harrison, whose finger- and palm-prints had no doubt obliterated many others on the telephone receiver, but, picking this up with greater care, by the earpiece, he dialed Whitehall 1212. The response was immediate, and the inspector then asked for two extension numbers, those of the Fingerprint Department and its no less important branch the Photographic Department. In the Metropolitan Police Area, though each of the twenty-three divisions has its own C.I.D. officer, when a crime is committed fingerprint and photographic experts are summoned from Scotland Yard.

While the inspector waited for their arrival, he went over the house with Mr. Harrison. The detective-sergeant interrogated the rest of the family, discouraging their impulse to illustrate their stories by touching things. The inspector himself, well trained though he was, took the extra precaution of keeping his hands behind his back most of the time. It was apparent to him that the burglar had known what he was after, and had worked with intelligence and restraint. Having simply pushed in a strip of leaded glass in the drawing-room window, which was not overlooked by neighboring houses, and satisfied himself that Chatsworth was empty, he had then, the inspector thought, begun his depredations on the first floor. All the bedroom doors there stood open, but the intruder was interested only in the elder Harrison's room, where Mrs. Harrison kept her jewel case in a locked drawer of her dressing table. The drawer and the case had been forced, and the case, empty, was left on the dressing table among silver-backed brushes and other expensive toilet implements whose value was insufficient to outweigh the disadvantage of their bulk. As the inspector saw it, the thief, having pocketed the jewels, had then gone through the drawing and dining rooms below, collecting small silver.

All this would have taken little time. What had the unknown done then? Had he left at once, or had he, as so often happens, lingered for a drink or food? It is at this stage, when the booty has been gathered, that a criminal tends to relax, if only for a few minutes, before quitting the scene of action as unobtrusively as he came. Anyone who has had to do a job under a considerable nervous tension knows that an immediate result is thirst, and breakers and enterers are notoriously addicted to a quick one for the road. It may be only water or lemonade. But during what in fact is reaction after strain the most cautious veteran will sometimes forget routine precautions he has employed automatically until that moment; having as a matter of course worked in gloves, he may even take one off to handle a bottle, or to peel an apple, and so leave fingerprints behind.

Mr. Harrison's small store of wine and spirits, kept in a sideboard cupboard in the dining room, did not appear to have been touched. Leaving it for the fingerprint people to examine, the Hanbury inspector asked Mrs. Harrison to see if she thought that anything in the kitchen was out of place. The kitchen was well lighted and extremely neat; china and polished glasses filled a glazed cupboard above the dresser; along the top of the dresser was ranked an array of painted tins marked Tea, Coffee, Sugar, and Biscuits, a large flat tin being for cake. Everything, said Mrs. Harrison, was as she had last seen it. So far as she could tell, food in the refrigerator had not been tampered with.

In the dining room, in the meantime, the constable was obtaining from Mr. Harrison and the two girls, with the aid of an address book, a preliminary list of all recent visitors to the house, beginning with the daily maid and the charwoman. He was at work on this, and his senior officers were returning with Mrs. Harrison from the kitchen, when a police car drew up outside. It was just after midnight.

Four officers had come from Scotland Yard—a first-class sergeant of the Fingerprint Department, on duty that night, accompanied by a detective-constable, and a sergeant from the photographic branch with his own assistant. All were in plain clothes. In the presence of the Harrison family the local inspector received the newcomers with due formality, but when he and his detective-sergeant had taken them into the drawing room formal manners were dropped, for all happened to be known to one another. C.I.D. officers from the Central Office work in teams, and the teams are often the same.

"Well, George," said the fingerprint sergeant, whose name was Ash, "here we are again, How's the wife?"

Social exchanges were brief, and the inspector got on with his tale. Sergeant key."You'll be getting after the maid," he said at the end.The other nodded. "And the char.

Some one told the fellow what to look for, and where to look. And when."

"Any ideas about him?"

"It might be so-and-so..." The inspector reeled off the names of several professions, known in the Division, who favored entry by leaded windows. "But it could be anybody. Needn't be a local.
It's money for jam. Only this is rather a bigger haul than usual. I've heard of Mrs. Harrison's jewelry."Sergeant Ash whistled more mournfully. "Some people never learn. Well, George, if you want to be home for breakfast, we'd better begin."By the broken window his assistant had opened an attaché case and was setting out on an occasional table two small bottles of fine powder, gray and black, and camel's-hair brushes of various sizes. Taking a bottle of gray powder and a small brush, he went into the hall, followed by the photographers with their camera and tripod. As Ash and the inspector passed by, on their way to the dining room, the camera was being set up, while the finger-print man lightly brushed powder over the telephone instrument.In the dining room the four Harrisons were still recalling the names of recent visitors, who were numerous, for friends of the two girls were constantly in and out. Mr. Harrison's glance at the sideboard suggested that he felt he could do with a drink. The divisional inspector soon left Sergeant Ash with the family and returned to the hall. The telephone instrument had been powdered and the surplus powder blown away, revealing on the receiver a mass of superimposed finger- and palm-prints, over all being the impression of Mr. Harrison's hand, moist with agitation. Photographs had then been taken, and the instrument being now available for use, the inspector rang up Hanbury Police Station to demand the immediate summoning, from their beds if necessary, of the Harrison's daily maid and charwoman. The detective-constable from the fingerprint Department had returned with the photographers to the drawing room, where he began to work over the window. The leading of the upper panes had been thrust inward until it broke, and many of the small colored segments of glass had fallen to the floor. All these, and the glass and glazing bars surrounding the gap, would be powdered and scrutinized and perhaps photographed. The patient work would be continued with the furniture of

had been in two glass-topped cabinet tables—and so onward, if it had to be done, throughout the house. Whole doors might be powdered and examined inch by inch. Movable objects, such as the cabinet tables, would probably be taken to Scotland Yard. Such labors, as Sergeant Ash told the startled Mrs. Harrison, have been known to go on for days.

The sergeant, however, had his own ideas. He was fond of taking what he called short cuts, the fruits, in fact, of considerable experience in the ways of criminals. He now rejoined his friend the inspector and went off with him to the kitchen. As the pair stood looking at the picture of neatness it presented, Sergeant Ash whistling again in a mournful key, an idea came to his companion, who reached out to feel two dishcloths hanging on a line. They appeared to be dry and clean, but, having felt the second one, the inspector fingered it again.

"I'd say that's been used since the family went off at six o'clock," he said.

The sergeant felt it too. "Aye, dampish," he agreed.

He ran his eye along the array of glasses in the glazed cupboard; opening this by inserting a pocketknife under the handle, he peered at a row of upturned tumblers. Then, taking a long pencil from his pocket, he pushed a tumbler towards him with the knife until the rim projected beyond the edge of the shelf and he could insert the unsharpened end of the pencil inside the inverted glass. When the end touched the bottom of the tumbler he pulled this off the shelf and spun it gently before his eyes, finally manipulating it back into its place without touching it with his fingers. Having repeated the process with the other five tumblers in the row, he shook his head.

"He probably had a drink, if he used that cloth. But he polished up after him. Trod on something, George?"

The inspector was standing on one leg and bending sideways to feel the sole of his other boot.

"Only a currant," he said. "But I can never bear squashy things underfoot. Reminds me of the beetles in the old kitchen when I was a boy."

"No beetles here," said the sergeant, but with an abstracted air. He was looking thoughtfully at the cake tin on the dresser. The tin was circular and flat, nearly a foot in diameter, and, like the other cylindrical tins, it was painted green, with "Cake" in gold letters on the lid. Sergeant Ash opened his pocketknife and, pushing the blade under the tin, caused this to rotate slowly on the dresser while he stooped to scrutinize every inch of the rounded side.

"Does your wife polish her cake tin, George?" he inquired. "Doesn't seem natural to me."

Stooping lower, his head on one side, he peered along the top of the lid, and then again rotated the tin to examine the side, the glossy surface of which reflected the bright kitchen light overhead.

"See what I see, George?"

The inspector stooped with him. "There's a blur there that might be a print."

"How do you open a tin like this, with a tight-fitting lid?"

The inspector, straightening himself, went through motions with his hands. Sergeant Ash began to whistle through his teeth again, but now it was a lively air.

"Yes," he said. "You get your nails under the edge of the lid. If you press the tin against your tummy you can lever the lid off without touching the side of the tin. You could do it one-handed, but if the fit's really close it wouldn't be so easy if you were wearing a glove. How do you put the lid on again?"

The inspector went through more motions in the air. "You'd need at least one thumb on top," he said.

"So you would, George. You'd press your thumb on top and your fingers against the side. There isn't a vestige of a print on this lid, but that's a dab on the side of the tin all right. Looks to me as if whoever last opened the tin gave it a hasty wipe over, but missed that print on the side. If it isn't a man's, the woman who made it has bigger hands than most."

Picking up his attaché case from the chair on which he had laid it, the sergeant again produced his bottle of gray powder, the porcelain dish, and a brush. He powdered the print on the cake tin, and blew the surplus powder away.

"A loop," he said.

His friend peered earnestly at what now was obviously a fingerprint on the side of the tin.

"Well, you would know," he said.

"As you say, George. Well, we'll check it with the family's. If it doesn't belong to any of them we'll have this pretty tin packed up and taken to the Yard straight away. I like short cuts," Sergeant Ash added, "and if I was a betting man I'd risk a bob on there being a currant cake inside."

The pair went back to the dining room, where the sergeant laid his attaché case on the table.

"Now, sir," he said to Mr. Harrison, "I must ask you all to have your fingerprints taken. We may have to take all your friends' prints too." From his attaché case he took out an inkpad and roller, some small fingerprint forms, a bottle of spirit, and a clean cloth. "These forms will be destroyed as soon as we've done with them," said the sergeant. "They're just for checking."

The prospect of being fingerprinted took Mr. Harrison's mind off his troubles and delighted his daughters, but Mrs. Harrison, looking at her hands, asked rather distastefully if it was really necessary.

"Elimination, ma'am," said Sergeant Ash. "You have what we call right of access. So have your friends, and your servants. The inspector here will look after them if necessary—take their prints on special forms like these, and send them to us. The forms will be destroyed afterwards. It's just a formality, ma'am. When we've printed all of you there may be a print in the house that don't belong. It may be the print of one of our friends, not yours."

Mrs. Harrison seemed dismayed. "You mean you will look all over the house for fingerprints? But that will take a long time."

"Days, ma'am, perhaps," said the sergeant cheerfully. "But we may be lucky," he added more encouragingly. "We have our own little ideas about where to look, and sometimes it pays to take a short cut." He started to whistle through his teeth, but, remembering his company, checked himself. "Now, sir," he said to Mr. Harrison.

The latter, much interested, had his fingers cleaned with spirit. First the thumb and then the fingers of his right hand were pressed firmly on the special form and rolled evenly from side to side. Satisfied with the result, Sergeant Ash repeated the process with Mr. Harrison's left hand. While Mr. Harrison wiped his fingers, his daughters eagerly followed him, but when his wife's turn came she submitted with obvious displeasure. Leaving her to clean her fingertips, Sergeant Ash drew the inspector into the hall.

"Harrison's prints are Whorls," he said, as soon as they were out of hearing. "So are his wife's. The girl's are Loops, but they're too small. However, we'll check 'em for the record."

Once more in the kitchen, under the bright light, Sergeant Ash compared the isolated print on the cake tin with those made by the Misses Harrison on the special forms. Size apart, there were enough points of difference, when indicated by the sergeant, to convince the divisional inspector that no member of the family had left the print on the tin.

Before two o'clock in the morning the cake tin was at Scotland Yard, conveyed there in the car which had brought Sergeant Ash and his colleagues to Chatsworth.

The Fingerprint Department, the Criminal Record Office, and the photographic studios and laboratory are housed, with the rest of the C.I.D., in New Scotland Yard North, commonly called the North Building, the third and newest of the three known generically throughout the world as Scotland Yard. No right-minded person, when using that term, is thinking of the Lost Property Office on the other bank of the Thames.

The senior officer on duty in the Scenes of Crime Section of the Fingerprint Department to whom the cake tin was delivered read the note from Sergeant Ash and then examined the imprint under a powerful light. He saw that it was a fairly well-defined pattern of the Loop type.

The fingerprint system employed by the British police and devised by Sir Edward Henry some fifty years ago groups the patterns of fingerprints into four main types: Arches, Loops, Whorls, and Composites. To simplify further the keeping and searching of records, Whorls and Composites are grouped together, and are given numerical values according to the digits on which they appear. Arches, which are divided into two groups—the Plain Arch and the Tented Arch—possess no numerical value. Neither do Loops, but these patterns play subsidiary, although important, parts in the Henry Classification Scheme.

If the four main types of fingerprint patterns were distributed in equal proportion on human fingers, classification would be much simplified, but unfortunately the proportion on Loops far exceeds the number of Arches, Whorls, and Composites. It follows, therefore, that, the imprint on Mrs. Harrison's cake tin being of the Loop type, the search was likely to be more difficult than if the pattern had been an Arch, Whorl, or Composite.

This, however, did not trouble the officer unduly, for after a few delicate touches with a camel's hair brush to remove a little surplus powder he again examined the imprint with a lens to which was attached a reticule inscribed with concentric circles. During the examination he was very careful not to allow the reticule to come into actual contact with the imprint.

He jotted down on a piece of paper the result of his scrutiny. Next he went through a series of motions with his hands over the tin. From these movements a casual observer might have formed the opinion that he was making some magical passes over the tin to conjure up some occult power to help him trace the unknown maker of the print on the tin. But he was really making tests to ascertain the particular digit responsible for the telltale imprint. If this could be done with certainty his task would be lightened immeasurably.

Presently he paused in his mystic passes, and it became evident that he had come to some conclusion. He ceased his tick-tack display and added a figure "4" to his notes.

The imprint was that of a Loop, you will recall, the most common of all types. Loops are divided into two categories—Radial and Ulnar—the latter being far more common than the former. The slope of the majority of the ridges of the print, together with the hand from which it is taken, decides into which category it is placed. The great majority of Loops which appear on the right hand have the trend of ridges to the right, and are designated Ulnar Loops; those on the left hand which slope to the left are again Ulnar Loops. In each case if the direction of the ridges is reversed the prints are Radial Loops.

Thus it will be seen that a solitary print of the Loop type having the trend of the ridges to the right could be (1) an Ulnar Loop made by a finger of the right hand or (2) a Radial Loop made by a finger of the left hand. If the trend of the ridges is to the left the same criterion is applied by inversion.

As the ridges of the print on the cake tin from Chatsworth sloped to the right, it appeared most likely that it had been made by a finger of the right hand—an Ulnar Loop—and less likely that it was a print from the left hand—a Radial Loop.

Now all Loops possess, in fingerprint language, two fixed points—(a) the core, (b) the delta. The core, as the term indicates, is located somewhere about the center of the print, and is usually the shape of an inverted staple (Ω). This staple is enclosed by a number of similar staples which increase in size until the delta is reached. In some prints the delta is situated near the core; in others at varying distances. It is the inconstancy of the position of the delta in different prints which provides valuable data for the classification of this common pattern. The number of ridges intervening between the core and delta may be any number from one to thirty or more.

The delta being present in the cake tin print, the examining officer carefully counted the ridges between it and the core. There were fifteen. He next turned his attention to the core. This was classified under the symbol "C." By means of a special lens he fixed the position of the delta as "F"—which meant that it was located between the fifth and sixth of the concentric circles of the reticule.

Having finished his examination of the print, he opened the cake tin. Sergeant

Ash had, in his accompanying note, asked for information about its contents. The tin contained a wedge of currant cake somewhat crumbled after its journey. The examining officer put the fragments into another container, replaced the lid, and made his way to the room which contained the Single Fingerprint Collection, taking the tin with him. Fingerprint men are very jealous of their fragile exhibits, and are careful to see that they are not mutilated or destroyed.

The method he proceeded to employ to classify the print on the tin was the invention of Superintendent Battley and Inspector Cherrill (later Chief Superintendent), and has simplified considerably the search for such isolated impressions among a collection running into millions of individual prints. By the Henry System a primary classification of 1024 is arrived at. Theoretically it would require an enormous cabinet of thirty-two rows of thirty-two pigeonholes to provide storage for the collection now existing in Scotland Yard, but in practice intensive subdivision has made it possible to house the fingerprints in a larger number of cabinets of convenient size.

Every fingerprint form in the collection has a complementary index card which enables a particular form to be located in a matter of seconds. Each form, however, pertaining as it does to a convicted criminal, has a complete set of ten prints upon it—one from each digit. Before the advent of the Single Fingerprint System the task of tracing the duplicate of a single casual print among millions of sets of ten had become all but an impossibility.

The Single Fingerprint System is in effect a series of ten collections numbered from 1 to 10, each number referring to individual digits as they appear on the official form. The general classification is based on Henry's formula, but more intensive classification is carried out by the use of the special lens referred to previously, and the designation of more subgroups by special reference to cores and deltas. The prints for inclusion in the collection are selected from duplicates of those filed in the Main Collection. Each individual print is filed in the appropriate sub-collection, the whole collection being coordinated by an index and housed in a single room in a number of cabinets.

Formulae on each card refer the searcher to the appropriate set of prints in the Main Collection.

So far as the examining officer knew, the fingerprint on Mrs. Harrison's cake tin might have no connection whatever with the robbery at Chatsworth. It might even have no connection with crime at all. On the other hand, it might be the print of a first offender or that of a more practiced hand whose owner had never been charged and whose prints, therefore, would not be on file in the Main Collection. In such case the photograph of the print would end up in the Scenes of Crime Collection, consisting of a large assortment of unidentified prints, many being those of innocent but unknown persons associated with innumerable police inquiries.

But Sergeant Ash felt that the print was worth immediate investigation, and if the examining officer, having studied the formulae he had worked out, went to the cabinet without much hope—well, it was all in the way of his daily or nightly job, as the case might be.

He pulled open a drawer. It was labeled "No. 4," and contained prints of the right ring finger. Under the number was an oblique stroke indicating that the patterns in the drawer were Ulnar Loops. Selecting a section of the cards marked "C. Core" and showing the number 15 over the letter "F" in the top righthand corner, he began to flick over the cards. A few seconds later he paused and withdrew a card. Using a hand lens, he quickly checked the print on it with the imprint on the tin. A satisfied smile flitted over his face. The meager but sufficient particulars on the card were laid out as shown opposite:

The symbols were identical with those the officer had jotted down previously. He noted the reference to the Criminal File entered on the card: it would be required shortly. The next step was to obtain a photograph of the imprint as quickly as possible. Taking the tin and the card, he hurried to the Photographic Department. There he pointed out the incriminating mark. A photographer immediately set up the tin in front of a camera fitted with a prism, which enables photographs of white powdered fingerprints to be taken direct on to bromide paper.

After a few adjustments of the lighting system an exposure was made. In a few seconds a clearly defined image of the print on the tin appeared. The photograph was merely shown the fixer, and there followed a rapid wash. It was blotted off, and very soon the examining officer was comparing the print disclosed in the still damp photograph with the impression on the card he had removed from No. 4 drawer of the Single Fingerprint Collection.

Yes! There was no doubt about it! Nemesis was overtaking the unwelcome visitor to Chatsworth. Leaving the tin with the photographer for permanent photographs to be made of the mark, the examining officer made his way to the Criminal Record Office. In a few moments the officer on duty there had produced a folder in which the principal item was the descriptive form of Albert William Simkin, aged twenty-seven, five feet three inches in height, blue-eyed, brown-haired, with a mole beneath his left shoulder blade and a scar on his right forearm, four times convicted of burglary, his last sentence having expired five months previously. Other documents in the folder provided information about Albert Simkin's various addresses and usual haunts (when not in prison), his parentage and friends, his more harmless pleasures—football and "the dogs"—and, what was of greater interest, his m.o., or modus operandi, when he went a-burglaring. He had twice broken into a house by means of a leaded window; he usually chose the evening hours when families went out to local cinema or to a theater, obtaining his information from a servant; he was careful and tidy on the job; and he liked a bite and a drink before leaving, having a special weakness for sweet cookies or cake.

A larger machinery of routine now went to work. Instructions were issued for the discovery and detention of Albert Simkin, particulars of whom were circulated. The fingerprint officer whose examination of the cake tin had led to this conclusion ended his brief part in the case by telephoning the good news to Sergeant Ash, still at Chatsworth. It was not yet three o'clock. That, in all human probability, the burglar had been identified within less than four hours of the Harrisons' discovery that their house had been entered was due to the efficiency of the fingerprint system.

It may be added that there was a slight delay in locating Albert Simkin. He was not to be found in his usual haunts. Possibly he had learned that the Harrisons' maid, a simple creature, complained angrily to the local inspector that the nice young man who had taken her out once or twice, and who had shown such a sympathetic interest in the behavior and habits of her employers, had failed to meet her at the cinema as he had promised to do, on the evening of the burglary. When eventually the nice young man was picked up, it was too late to recover the Harrisons' lost property. But Mr. Simkin himself, as a result of his weakness for cake, and his carelessness in wiping a tin, is now undergoing his fifth and so far his heaviest, term of imprisonment.

It is unlikely that he is historically minded, or that prison libraries contain books on fingerprints. To the end of his life he will probably remain unaware that the process which has several times led to his undoing, and which will be a continual menace to him unless he alters his habits, has a history that goes back a very long way.

GOOD RECORD
California's motorists approach the summer holidays with the best traffic safety record in recent years.

"Let's keep it that way," urged the California Highway Patrol today.

At the same time the Patrol cautioned motorists that many persons are expected to die in California traffic during the summer according to the estimates of statisticians.

Highway Patrol Commissioner B. R. Caldwell announced that the Patrol will continue to emphasize visible enforcement to discourage accident-causing violations and offered a five point program for motorists in order to help them stay alive in the heaviest traffic of the year thus far:

1. Be sure the car is in safe mechanical condition before starting.
2. Never plan a trip longer than can be made with safety.
3. Travel in the proper lane at a speed consistent with the flow of traffic.
4. Do not drive when overtired or sleepy.
5. Never drive after drinking.

"If holiday highway users will manage their driving to comply with these five points, we can create a pleasant surprise for the statisticians and also make this year, 1955, a time to honor the dead and not a time to join them," Caldwell commented.

"Another pedestrian practice which causes a large number of deaths is walking on the wrong side of a rural highway, Caldwell added. The lawful and safe method is to walk as close to the left side of the highway as possible, facing on-coming traffic. This allows the pedestrian to watch traffic and gives him time to step out of the way when necessary."

LEAVE NOZZLE ALONE
It is a great deal easier to wash the car with a hose if the nozzle is left off entirely, points out the National Automobile Club. The nozzle, regardless of the setting used, gives the water greater pressure than if it is allowed to flow unrestricted from the end of the hose. As little pressure as possible is the desirable thing. Besides, the task of washing is less messy if the nozzle is removed from the hose.

FRESNO, CALIFORNIATHE SOCIAL ROOTS OF CRIME

From the book, PROTECTING OUR CHILDREN, by John R. Ellington, copyright, 1948, by Prentice-Hall Inc.

In our society two conflicting aims struggle to control both the administration of criminal justice and the treatment of disobedient or offending children, whether by parents, school, or the law. These opposed aims are punishment to fit the crime versus individual treatment to win the offender over to acceptable behavior. Back of the conflicting aims stand conflicting ideas about the reasons each of us behaves the way we do.

As the earliest and long the sole aim, punishment has the inside track. It enjoys the sanction of our instinctive reactions, of the ancient law-givers, and of the mediaeval theology that so largely shaped the Western world. It rests on the fundamental human impulse to strike out against what harms us. Thus primitive tribes retaliated against those individuals who put the whole tribe in danger by such major crimes as sorcery or treason. They left it to the individual or his clan to avenge the much less serious personal wrongs such as murder, theft, or slander on the basis of life for life, eye for eye, stripe for stripe.

No moral judgments or interest in motives entered into the use of punishments by primitive people. A man died for killing another by accident just as surely as if he had lain in wait for him with a knife. It remained for the theologians of the early Middle Ages to introduce the emphasis on motives with their doctrines of free will and of original sin. They insisted that an individual sins or breaks the law solely because he wilfully prefers evil to good. He is a free moral agent who always knows right from wrong and is always free to choose between them. If he chooses evil he not only harms society but challenges the divine order. He must be punished to atone for his sin and to serve as a warning to others to deter them from committing the same offense. Christendom held to this doctrine of wilful evil for centuries and, while it did, justice could have no interest in the personality of the individual or in the circumstances surrounding the act. In theory, at least, and often enough in fact, justice fixed its eyes exclusively on the theft, unmindful of whether the thief was a child or was starving. Its duty was limited to measuring the degree of evil and to weighing out the amount of punishment that would expiate the crime.

The associated doctrine of original sin held that a tendency to evil is born in each of us, inherited from Adam as a consequence of his sin in the Garden of Eden. And so John Robinson, an English Puritan divine, could say in the early 1600's: "And surely there is in all children, though not alike, a stubbornness, and stoutness of mind arising from natural pride, which must, in the first place, be broken and beaten down . . .¹ And in colonial America the criminal code of the Province of East Jersey, adopted in 1688, could decree that a child convicted of assaulting or cursing his parents or of persistent disobedience or stubbornness should be hanged.

As society grew more humane, the law relaxed the barbarity of its punishments but without altering its basic belief in the complete moral responsibility of the offender or in the need for punishment and expiation. Thus, when in the late 18th and early 19th centuries imprisonment largely replaced executions, tortures, and pillories, the old belief that the law breaker was inspired by moral perversity determined the nature of the new institutions. They became penitentiaries to "encourage" the criminal to repent his wilful sins. In time, the law conceded that the insane could not be held morally responsible for their acts and exempted them, as it had long exempted children under seven, from the sanctions of the criminal code. Finally, less than a century ago came the first major challenge to the belief in wilful evil as the cause of crime that underlay the whole administration of criminal justice. New insight into human behavior has continually reinforced the attack. As a result, new aims and procedures such as probation, the juvenile court, and clinical diagnosis have been injected into the administration of criminal justice.

Nevertheless, the ancient reliance on punishment remains dominant in the criminal code, in the machinery for its enforcement, and in the minds of many of its administrators. A section of the public cries frankly for punishment as revenge, and men still talk of making a criminal pay his debt to society "in the coinage of punishment." However, the main prop behind the punitive system is the doctrine of deterrence. Punish a man and he will be afraid to sin again. Also the example of his suffering will keep others from breaking the law and destroying the social order. In other words, fear and fear only keeps our lawless tendencies in line.

Is this true? What leads men to commit crimes? What determines the way any man acts? Until we make up our minds on these points we can scarcely hope to bring reason and order into the administration of criminal justice or to do anything very effective to prevent delinquency. Until we answer these questions we cannot avoid frittering away our energies on more earnest but largely futile efforts to control delinquency and crime. The responsibility for gaining a deeper insight into human behavior cannot be left to specialists. Only as parents, teachers, and the citizenry share in the understanding of behavior and recognize their own major part in pushing children into rebellion, delinquency, crime, and neuroses can prevention reach its maximum effectiveness. Only as police, judges, probation officers, and all the other agents of law enforcement discover the true nature of the human material with which they are dealing (and take a look at their own motives and desires) will correction move up from an accident to an art.

Some Discredited Causes

Since the middle of the last century, a good deal of scientific information on the factors that lead human being to act, each of us in our own particular way, has piled up to disprove the notion that an individual who breaks the law or commits a socially unacceptable act does so solely because of a wilful preference for evil. The by-no-means unique case history of the normal girl, secure in a well-balanced family relationship, who at 17 fell ill of encephalitis and ultimately got up from her sick bed a confirmed liar and thief demonstrates what a brain lesion can do to alter a behavior pattern. There was nothing wilful about her change to anti-social behavior.

The foregoing illustration serves merely to bring out sharply how factors quite outside the individual's control can lead him or her to commit crimes. It suggests a simple relationship between cause and effect which rarely holds true. Yet we still hear people, who should know better, eagerly fixing on one single factor or another to explain all the misbehavior of our age — broken homes, working mothers, lack of religious instruction, drinking, gangster films and radio programs, the automobile, unemployment, poverty, slum housing, lack of playgrounds and clubs. Early in the century, many earnest people looked with suspicion on cigarettes and dime novels.

Science, itself, has had its many periods of oversimplification. Eighty years ago, Cesare Lombroso, the man who performed the great service of directing attention from the crime to the criminal and thereby led the attack on the moral wilfulness theory, strove to prove that the criminal is a physical and mental throwback to primitive man, a kind of contemporary Neanderthal. In recent years the Harvard anthropologist, Earnest A. Hooton, has lent his efforts and pen to support this theory. It would be interesting to have Professor Hooton measure the heads of the several million former members of Nazi S.S. and Brown Shirts to determine whether they differ perceptibly from the rest of the German population, or from the rest of us.

For a time the more articulate investigators insisted that only feeble-minded people could become criminals and that the condition was inherited and ran in families, of which the Jukes and the Kallikaks became the popular symbols. When studies of criminals in prisons proved that the majority possessed normal intelligence, and when other studies proved that perhaps not one half of true feeble-mindedness is inherited, the theory crumbled. One fact of value remains from the investigations, however. Feeble-minded people are easily led or influenced so that they respond readily to exposure to criminal or vicious behavior. Consequently we can say that feeble-mindedness is one important factor in some cases of delinquency and crime.

More recently, pioneering work with the glands of internal secretion—the thyroid, pituitary, adrenal, thymus, and other glands—led some endocrinologists to claim that all criminal acts trace to abnormal conditions of these glands. If a man stages a fake bankruptcy or commits a rape or murder—said this theory—it is because his glands fail to work properly. Perhaps, as we shall see later, glandular dysfunction, like heart disease or deafness or feeble-mindedness, may be one factor in the commission of crimes by some individuals, but it is no more than that.

To advance any single cause or explanation for all delinquency and crime is to repeat the error of our ancestors who clung to the moral-wilfulness theory. The explanation of a particular act of law breaking may be single and simple. Thus, sheer accident explains the death of a youth who is knocked down in a fair fight and chances to strike his head on a curb and die. The act of the young driver who for a reason not necessarily his fault hits a pedestrian and in panic drives away can also be attributed to chance. We have seen in the instance of the victim of encephalitis that the explanation of the criminal behavior of a particular individual may also be single and, for practical purposes, simple. The injury to the brain cells may result from mishandling at birth or from a subsequent accident as well as from disease. Also there may be a defect in the brain organization in the same way that a child may be born with six fingers.

The percentage of such unfortunate victims of brain pathology is small both in prisons and in the general population. The percentage of accidental offenders in prisons is far too large. However, the explanation of the behavior of the majority of convicts and of the great majority of criminals at large is not simple but lies deep-seated in the environment, human and material, and in the individual's reaction to it. In the complicated interactions that result in most delinquency and crime, it is misleading to speak of a single cause, such as broken homes or poverty or feeble-mindedness. These are at most contributing factors that affect behavior only in association with other factors. The hopeful fact lies in the achievement of science in identifying social conditions as the dominant factor in most delinquency and crime.

Changing Definitions of Crime

To test the foregoing statement let us look not at the causes of unacceptable behavior but at the acts themselves. What is crime? The obvious answer would seem to be, whatever the law says it is. If so, what of the blue laws in Delaware which make selling a newspaper or taking an automobile ride on Sunday punishable offenses? What of the law in one southern state that still provides the death penalty for a third successive failure to attend church on Sunday? What of prohibition?

Perhaps we should narrow the definition of crime to specific acts like murder, rape, arson, and theft. Was it, then, a crime during the occupation for Polish, French, or Norwegian boys to stick knives in the backs of Germans, or to set fire to Nazi warehouses or to steal food and guns? Certainly in the not-so-distant days of the American frontier, neither the law nor public opinion considered those pioneers to be criminal who acted in the belief that "the only good Indian is a dead Indian." The Japanese Samurai are reported to have held on, down to relatively modern times, to the feudal right of exercising their swords on the necks of peasants. William L. Shirer has reported a 1940 Berlin conversation with two young Nazis back from the occupation of Poland in which they told him as a matter of course of using Polish citizens as they might tin cans for pistol practice. The most shocking element in the story was their complete unawareness of anything morally reprehensible in their actions.

The point of these dissimilar illustrations is to bring out the fact that in none of the societies concerned were the acts considered crimes. Their members committed these acts of violence not because their glands failed to function properly, or because individually they were biological throwbacks to primitive man, or because they came from poverty stricken slums. Each was merely following the pattern of behavior set by his society.

These considerations lead us to several useful conclusions. First, to a practical definition as distinguished from a definition based on morals: Crime is whatever the dominant elements of a particular society believe to be dangerous to the security and solidarity of the society at any particular time. The crime conceptions of one society differ from those of another, and within a given society the conception changes. A society can be tragically wrong in its definition of crime, as the executions for witchcraft in colonial New England demonstrate. And a change in conception can be wrong, as our experiment with prohibition bears witness.

The Influence of a Lawless Society

These changing definitions of crime seem to reduce to absurdity the idea that individuals are born "bad." It would appear that none of us is born either "bad" or "good." Rather, each of us enters the world, as the Germans have recently demonstrated, capable alike of evil and of good. On which side our behavior falls is determined largely, though not wholly, by the ideas and behavior of the community into which we are born. The lawlessness of American citizens largely reflects the lawlessness of American society on which we touched in Chapter 1. Our efforts to reform bad individuals will prove vastly more successful when we reform the badness of our social values and behavior—our worship of material success no matter how it is achieved; our respect not for competence but for aggressive competition, not for good workmanship or for cooperation, but for getting ahead of the other fellow; the too common effort of business and organized labor and the professions to get "something for nothing" regardless of the rest of the community; the violence of picket lines and goon squads; the too frequent corruption of local government and law enforcement officials; aggressive intolerance of Mexican, Negro, Japanese, Jewish and other minorities. In the main our children and young people learn conduct not from what we say but from what we do.

Let us see what these generalizations mean in terms of day-to-day behavior and example. In three articles in its issues of July, August, and September 1941, the Reader's Digest reported the results of a nationwide investigation of the business ethics of garages, radio repair shops, and watch repair shops. The investigations were made by a man and woman who spent three months in a tour of the nation. To test garages, they would disconnect a coil wire so that it was "glaringly obvious" just before driving in. Out of 347 garages in all 48 states, 129 spotted the wire at once, told the drivers, and either charged nothing or a nominal sum. The rest, 63 per cent, "took the investigators for suckers and treated them accordingly.... Three out of five garage men will overcharge, lie, insert unnecessary work, or charge for work not done, for new parts not needed, for parts not installed." The investigators found that small towns and small garages were much more honest than cities and elaborate garages.

To test the radio repair shops, the investigators would loosen a tube or disconnect a wire in a new radio. Says the report: "A repair man who didn't see them or speak up was taking the first step toward petty thievery." Out of 304 shops in 48 states, 109 spotted the obvious trouble, repaired it and either made no charge or a minor charge; 195 tried to take advantage of the customer. Summing up, the report said: "When the average American takes his radio set into a repair shop... he will be cheated 64 out of every 100 times by repair men who will sell him tubes, batteries, and service which his set doesn't need, or charge him for new parts they didn't put in. In some cases they will even remove good parts and add them to the supply on their shelves, substituting inferior equipment." Again the big cities showed up worse than the small towns.

The watchmakers made a slightly better showing than their fellow craftsmen. Out of 462 watch repair men in the 48 states, 229 or 49 per cent "lied, overcharged, gave phoney diagnoses, or suggested expensive and unnecessary repairs." The test involved loosening the little screw that fastens the winding wheel. In all, 236 repair men or 51 per cent met the test by swiftly correcting the trouble and of these only 8 charged anything at all.

It is perhaps no wonder that youths doing time in reform schools for the theft of a car, a burglary, or snatching a purse feel—as almost all of them do—that they are not worse but only less lucky than the unimprisoned citizens who sent them there.

Delinquency Areas

However, the immediate interest of those dealing with recognized delinquents and criminals is not so much in the influence on children exerted by lawlessness in the general cultural pattern as it is in the influence on children of the aggressively lawless patterns of certain areas and neighborhoods. Ideas, customs, and habits of conduct are never universal, not even the dominant ones. Islands of differential behavior exist in different sections of the country and within cities and regions. Some variant behavior may be as innocent as the Texans' fondness for ten-gallon hats. But other variant behavior constitutes a direct attack on the social order. Neighborhoods marked by such behavior manufacture delinquents and criminals. They may have up to 25 per cent of their boys aged 10 to 17 arrested for delinquency every year. Just what this means appears by comparison with more favored home neighborhoods in which the proportion of annual arrests and referrals to the juvenile court shades down to less than one per cent of all resident boys.²

These "delinquency areas," as Clifford Shaw calls them, are the readily recognizable slums and blighted areas of our cities. Bad housing identifies them. Bad in that it is run down, unpainted, dirty, hidden from the sun, infected with rats and vermin, equipped with hall toilets or even outdoor privies that have to be shared with many families. Bad in that it is overcrowded, with children and adults of both sexes sleeping in the same rooms, denying to all any privacy of person or possessions or emotions. Bad in that it provides children no space to play and drives them into the streets, alleys, cellars and vacant houses. Bad in that it warehouses, freight yards, traffic encroach on the dwellings. In these areas the city finds it easy to neglect the schools, health services, pavements, garbage collection, and other public services. Almost always tuberculosis rates far exceed those in more favored neighborhoods.

As soon as any family can afford to, it generally escapes from the slum and blighted area, leaving it to the poverty stricken and demoralized, to the new immigrants from Europe and Latin America and from the rural South. The mixed population with its high mobility rarely acquires the sense of community of the typical neighborhood. The lack of social standards invites the shady rooming house and tavern, the professional crook and the gangster. These latter, as the symbols of success and power, are likely to be the "leading citizens" of the neighborhood and to become the heroes of impressionable youngsters. From the statement of a delinquent boy in Chicago, Shaw quotes the following illuminating comment:

Every boy has some ideal he looks up to and admires. His ideal may be Babe Ruth, Jack Dempsey, Al Canone, or some other crook. His ideal is what he wants to be like when he grows up and becomes a man. When I was twelve years old we moved into a neighborhood where there lived a mob of gangsters and big crooks.

²These figures may show a greater difference in delinquent behavior between different neighborhoods than the facts justify. Children of well-to-do citizens commit many offenses including serious ones that do not appear in the statistics because police turn the children over to their parents rather than to the court.

They were all swell dressers and had big cars and carried 'gats.' Us kids saw those swell guys and mingled with them in the cigar store on the corner. Jack Gurney was the one in the mob that I had a fancy to. He used to take my sis out and that was how I saw him often. He was in the stick-up racket before he was in the beer racket and was a swell dresser and had lots of dough. He was a nifty guy and went in for big stuff. He was a mysterious fellow and would disappear sometimes for several days but always came back. He was looked up to as the leader of his mob and anybody would gladly be in his place.³

Delinquency the Key to Respect

In such areas delinquency and crime may become a social tradition, passed on from boy to boy, from group to group, and from generation to generation just as naturally as the practice of church attendance and playing baseball are passed on in other neighborhoods. In the gang, the natural form of boyhood association, one generation of boys after another learns to shoplift, to pilfer from railroads and old buildings, to raid stores and trucks, to roll drunks, and to carry on deadly gang wars. Another of Shaw's youthful informants gives a vivid picture of how and why delinquency starts and evolves:

When we were shoplifting we always made a game of it. For example, we might gamble on who could steal the most caps in a day or who could steal in the presence of a detective and then get away. We were always daring each other that way and thinking up new schemes. This was the best part of the game. I would go into a store to steal a cap by trying on one, and when the clerk was not watching walk out of the store, leaving the old cap. With the new cap on my head I would go into another store, do the same thing as in the other store, getting a new hat and leave the one I had taken from the other place. I might do this all day and have one hat at night. It was fun I wanted, not the hat. I kept this up for months and then began to sell the things to a man on the west side. It was at this time that I began to steal for gain.⁴

Do so many children in blighted areas imitate these delinquent activities because they are "moral imbeciles"? The evidence indicates that they do it for the same reasons that boys in more fortunate communities imitate the acceptable behavior of such communities — to gain recognition, approval, companionship, and excitement. In delinquent areas a boy wins honor by showing bravery in committing daring crimes, by refusing to betray his pals to the police, by a long record of arrests and court appearances, by doing time in an institution. In areas of bad racial friction and gang wars, knifing a member of the rival gang is no crime in the eyes of the group. It may be a condition of survival as it certainly is the key to the respect of the boy's pals that he so badly wants.

The blighted area with its destructive behavior patterns is by no means confined to the city. It often sprawls across the tracks into the unincorporated sections and occurs in small towns and rural regions from coast to coast. Filth and overcrowding reach their peak in some of the camps provided for migrant and rural workers. The majority of commitments to reform schools and prisons come from delinquent areas of one kind or another, urban, suburban, and rural.

The Major Role of the Delinquency Area

Shaw and his associates have some rather striking statistical proof that the bad behavior example set by delinquency areas and the unsatisfactory human relationships found in them exercise the decisive causative influence in the delinquency and crime of the majority of those children and adults who come to the attention of the law. Studying the home addresses of all known juvenile delinquents and adult offenders in Chicago from 1899 to 1933 (studies later extended through 1940), the investigators found that the so-called delinquency areas maintained their disproportionately high percentages of delinquents and criminals continuously over the entire period. This was true even though the population of some of the delinquency areas changed during the four decades from predominantly German, Irish, English and French immigrants to Scandinavian, then to Polish, and finally to Italian. The children of all nationality groups showed the same high rate of arrest so long as they lived in the area. As soon as each nationality group prospered and moved to more desirable neighborhoods, the delinquency rate of their children fell off sharply to the level of that characteristic of the better neighborhoods.⁵

This is vital information. It means that the majority of children and youths who break the laws when subjected to the social conditions and human relationships of blighted areas would be law-abiding under other conditions. It stamps traditional delinquency and crime as mainly a neighborhood phenomenon. It puts major responsibility for delinquency and crime squarely on society and furnishes indispensable guidance for prevention, with which we deal in the second half of this book.

The Need for Deeper Insight

However, in this search for a useful insight into socially unacceptable conduct we need constantly to avoid the trap of oversimplification. We know that destructive neighborhood influences lead many children into conduct that society disapproves. But do we know how that influence is exerted, or why it affects one child and not another? In spite of the high percentage of problem children produced by delinquency areas, the majority of boys and girls brought up in them avoid seriously unacceptable conduct. They do not get into trouble with the law and some of them rise to the top rank of useful citizens. Why? One obvious explanation lies in one direction. Against the corrupting forces of the street and the gang there may stand the constructive force of an affectionate, understanding, and law-abiding family which can be the strongest barrier against delinquency. Nevertheless, these explanations do not go deep enough. They do not help us to understand, for instance, how the minister's son brought up in a good neighborhood sometimes breaks out into socially unacceptable behavior. They throw no light on why, of a pair of twins brought up under apparently the same conditions, one becomes a truant, bully, and thief while the other grows up in the same environment to be cooperative and law-abiding.

For a deeper insight into delinquent behavior we need to know: (1) something of the changing nature of human personality and what "growing up" means and involves; (2) something of the basic needs and goals common to all human beings; and (3) something of the differences that distinguish every human being from every other.

Humility is the only proper attire in which to approach the dark continents of the human mind. Substantial areas remain unknown or disputed. Nevertheless out of all the theories and investigations of many different sciences, out of many practical experiments in handling offenders, and out of recent world history there have emerged enough conclusions to show the way to more effective control of behavior.

RECOGNIZING MURDER
From the book THE DETECTION OF MURDER, by W. F. Kessler, M. D. and Paul B. Weston, copyright, 1953, by Greenberg, publisher.

Nowhere in the world is the investigation of unexplained or unexpected death so casual and haphazard as it is in the United States. Of the close to 300,000 deaths in the United States each year from suspicious or violent causes, only a little more than 10,000 are officially recognized as murders.

Murder Doesn't Always "Out"
When a murder is discovered and the killer arrested, the usual response of the general public is, "What a stupid man." And what they think is true—only the "stupid" murderers are caught. Those who escape punishment for committing murder successfully conceal their crimes by simulating suicide, accidental injury, or natural death.

Literally, thousands of people each year are getting away with murder.

One "almost perfect" murder case in Baltimore highlighted this fact. George Edward Grammer was tried for the murder of his wife after what looked at first glance like an accident and, but for circumstances which could not have been foreseen by the murderer, would have been classified as an accidental death.

Grammer was charged with beating his wife to death in their automobile, then placing a pebble under the accelerator and sending the car rolling down a hill to make it appear that she was killed in an ordinary traffic accident. It was contended that he expected the smash-up to conceal the injuries inflicted during the beating and to dislodge the pebble under the accelerator. It was pointed out that the police would find only a woman fatally injured in the debris of a wrecked car. Who would suspect the death weapon to be other than the automobile? Who would notice a small pebble on the floor of an ordinary wreck?

However, the Grammer car was not wrecked completely and two police officers happened to be eye-witnesses to its flight down the hill with the inert passenger at the wheel. Only chance resulted in the discovery of murder.

Another example of the fact that murder sometimes doesn't out for quite some time, if at all, is a New York City case. Edward Doyle had murdered a man, married, and fathered two children before his conscience bothered him and he revealed the killing to the police.

The dead man had been found at the foot of a basement stairway on November 1, 1945. His head was crushed, but he had not been robbed. Death due to "accidental fall" was listed on the records.

Six years later, on January, 13, 1951, Edward Doyle walked into a police station and told them about the murder: "It was in October or November in 1945, in a bar and grill on Broadway and Kosciusko Street." He unfolded a story of a spell of drinking, of getting into conversation with a soldier, and of an argument over some kind of a bet. "So we went outside," Doyle continued, "walked a block and a half, passed this building, and I noticed the basement stairway. I pushed him down and left. I read the next morning about a soldier who was found dead and that his name was Hugh Kelly."

Every now and then the facts of a murder rear out of the mass of unexplained and unexpected deaths. Many of these are classified as suicide, accident, or natural death.

Similarity of Death Mechanisms

In one of the following chapters, it will be shown that the techniques of murder are startlingly similar to those of suicide and accidental death in numerous instances. People use illuminating gas to commit suicide, others have used it to kill; people shoot themselves, and many murderers have used firearms as murder devices; and people jump from great heights, while others may be pushed. Many accidental deaths have occurred from faulty gas fixtures, firearms, or falling from a height.

Two recent cases illustrate the difficulty of determining the agency of death.

In Milwaukee a despondent housewife crawled inside an oil furnace, let the door swing shut, then used a homemade device to trip the controls and cremate herself. Van Hecke, county medical officer, stated police informed the local press. Dr. L. J. that he'd been informed that the woman had suffered mental disturbances recently, but said there was still a possibility that she was the victim of gruesome murder.

Police found a length of cord and rubber band tied together and dangling from the oil-burner switch. They reasoned that the dead woman had attached the cord to the switch and then crawled into the cold furnace. After crawling into the fire box she then tugged on the string to the switch, igniting the furnace.

This was a difficult case to resolve in view of the unusual mechanism of death. Women usually seek the less violent means of death when they commit suicide. Most of them even rebel at shooting, preferring gas or sleeping pills. The furnace was an unusual suicide device. It would be expected that a murderer would resort to such a mechanism.

The second case concerned the death of Mrs. Jeanne Brown, a woman of about 30, married and living with her husband in New York. This dark-haired, pretty woman was found dead in an expensively furnished apartment by her aunt and the building superintendent.

Her jugular vein was cut. The body, clad only in a housecoat, was in a sitting position on the floor, propped against the bed. A number of empty beer bottles and one empty whiskey bottle were in the room and a beer can opener was found on the floor near the body.

She had been dead about 12 hours when discovered and was last seen alive by the superintendent when he noticed her sitting at the window of her apartment. He had entered her apartment with a pass key at the insistence of the dead woman's aunt who was worried because of Mrs. Brown's failure to answer the telephone or her repeated knockings upon the door of the apartment.

Police found no signs of struggle. They learned that the husband was working as a Chief Engineer on a ship sailing the Persian Gulf at the time of the killing, and that the victim had been treated for alcoholism about sixty days prior to her death. They also noted that the telephone wires had been ripped down from the wall. Further investigation revealed that Mrs. Brown had been married eighteen months and had lived very quietly, never having any male visitors while her husband was away.

The police, the office of the District Attorney, and the Medical Examiner did not see eye to eye. The Assistant Medical Examiner was quoted as terming it a "definite homicide," later as a "possible homicide." Police, said the District Attorney's investigators, pointed out that there were no signs of a struggle or any other evidence to point to the presence of another person in the apartment at the time of death. They said that the woman had been known to rip telephone wires from the wall previously.

As reconstructed by police, the death occurred after some drinking. Mrs. Brown apparently had the beer can opener in her hand when she ripped out the wires. When the wires were pulled out her arm swung around, and the opener slashed her throat. Not realizing how badly she was hurt, she grabbed a batch of facial tissues, placed them against the wound and fell asleep. Within a half hour or so she bled to death.

Murder is not always easy to recognize—a fact which these two unusual suicide cases illustrate. Non-violent deaths present an equally difficult problem to the police in determining whether death resulted from a criminal agency or from natural causes.

dental injuries. In some instances officers at the scene of an accident or an apparent suicide have failed to take note of evidence at the scene which practically screams: "This is murder!" Failing to observe the tell-tale signs of murder, they report "apparently suicide" or "death due to accident."

The first officer on the scene of a homicide should learn to know the signs which would put a death in the classification of "under suspicious circumstances" in order that the forces of law and order will not lose precious minutes in seeking out a killer.

Death may be due to (a) natural causes; (b) self-inflicted wounds; (c) injuries received in an accident, or (d) the result of a murderous attack.

The officer must find out which of the four possible mechanisms caused death, and then find evidence to support his conclusions. He must, therefore, seek a person skilled in medicine to determine the cause of death from an examination of the body of the victim. Only physicians can perform a post-mortem examination. The official who performs the autopsy is usually called a coroner or a medical examiner.

It is the duty of the police to investigate the circumstances attending the death by an examination of the scene and questioning witnesses. His object is to explore the events that led up to it and to seek a reconstruction of the last hours spent on earth by the deceased. From this portion of the initial investigation, it is expected that a reasonable conclusion as to the possible mechanism of death can be made.

This information is passed on to the surgeon who is performing the autopsy. It is then the duty of this member of the medical profession to determine the cause of death, the mechanism that brought it about, and any contributing factors.

Armed with this autopsy report, the police continue to search into the background of the deceased for any evidence which would tend to clarify the details of the case and perhaps controvert the autopsy findings. Then, and only then, have the police and the medical profession discharged their responsibility.

Experienced police officers and medical examiners are astounded by the ease with which the untrained and the incompetent make positive statements at a death scene—statements which are entirely at odds with the conditions that exist or with common sense. They are amazed by the manner in which these inexperienced individuals can readily recognize a suicide or an accidental death but have trouble in marshalling the evidence which points to murder.

illustrates how self-appointed "experts" can prevent the detection of murder by hastily arriving at wrong conclusions.

A police officer in a large Eastern city found a man lying on a landing at the top of a flight of stairs. He was lying on his left side in a pool of blood and whiskey. Scattered about the slowly coagulating blood were pieces of glass, part of the label describing the merits of a cheap brand of whiskey being attached to one of the larger glass fragments.

"The guy's coming upstairs with a bottle of whiskey and fell on the bottle," the officer told the detectives upon arrival.

"Doc," one of the detectives in the case addressed the medical examiner's assistant as he arrived on the scene a short time later. "The poor guy fell on a bottle of whiskey he was carrying."

The young physician's trained eye noted the man, the bottle fragments, and the blood, but he failed to examine all the facts because of the comment of the detective. It fixed an idea in his mind which fitted the pattern of the scene. "Too bad," he said as he straightened up. "Looks like a man that liked a drink, too."

The body of the deceased was sent to the morgue, an autopsy was performed, the blood and glass on the landing cleaned up, and the case closed.

This case was classified as an accidental death. It was believed that the weight of the body had caused several glass fragments to lacerate the left arm pit when he fell, and death resulted from loss of blood.

Friends and relatives of the dead man, however, believed he was murdered—stabbed in a drunken fight. They said he was not the sort of man who would commit suicide.

A year later the details did leak out. The woman with whom he lived admitted in a drunken brag that she had killed him. She had grasped the bottle of whiskey she was bringing home for them by its neck and broken it against the stair railing. As her paramour raised his arm to strike her, she drove the jagged edges of the broken bottle into his armpit. As he fell, she released her grasp on the bottle's neck and ran.

She was never prosecuted. There were no eye-witnesses, no fragments of glass, and no testimony as to the location of the various fragments. No one had ever processed the larger pieces of glass for fingerprints, no one had bothered to photograph the scene—in fact no one had bothered to conduct anything more than a cursory investigation. It's small wonder that murder is difficult to recognize.

Duel Responsibility

The detection of murder is a divided responsibility—a responsibility that rests with the agents of law enforcement and with the medical profession. The two agencies bent on detecting murder complement each other. The ability and knowledge of one does not compensate for incompetence and lack of training in the other. Both must function at top efficiency.

In the investigation of suspicious deaths cooperation between investigator and medical examiner is essential. The investigator must know his own duties and what he may expect from a coroner or medical examiner, and the physician performing the autopsy should also know his own tasks and have a full knowledge of what he has a right to expect from the investigator.

Armed with knowledge the detective-physician team can fight the "smart" killers, detect their crimes, and bring them to justice.

CHECK THE CAUSE

If you have had several near traffic accidents in recent months now is the time to check the cause.

Arnold E. Archibald, president of the San Francisco Chapter of the National Safety Council, warned motorists that many accidents are preceded by several "close encounters."

"Defective eyes, slowed up reactions, continued fatigue and poor physical condition may be responsible. After several near brushes a driver should have a check-up for his own good—and the safety of others. He may find a hidden reason for his trouble. Often it has been found that glasses, or a change of lenses, will correct the trouble," Archibald said.

"If it is found that reactions have been slowed—either by illness or advanced years—the driver will be aware of it and can intelligently allow for it in his driving. Distances between their car and the car ahead should be increased; normal driving speeds should be reduced slightly; and more attention should be given to autos approaching from the side," the safety official added.

National police reports on "accident repeaters" show that many of these people could be "cured" by a visit to their doctor or to an optometrist, Archibald reported.

PUBLIC SERVICEFrom the book THE INVESTIGATOR'S HANDBOOK, by Arthur Liebers and Capt. Carl Vollmer, N.Y.P.D., copyright, 1954, by Arco Publishing Company.

While the criminal investigator receives wide publicity on television, and in the pages of mystery magazines, most civil investigators perform their important duties in jobs which the average person is not aware of. Practically every government bureau and agency employs investigators, and the investigative positions are among the better paid civil service posts. Federal, state, county, and municipal governments all offer employment opportunities for investigators, and their work is both interesting and rewarding.

The Department of Justice, whose jurisdiction is mainly criminal, utilizes civil investigators in its Claim Division, and the Criminal Investigation division of the Defense Department has a staff of civilian investigators. The Transportation Corps and Quartermaster Corps of the Army utilize investigators. The office of Naval Intelligence numbers civilian investigators on its roster. Other Federal agencies which offer opportunities in the field of civil investigation are: Department of Commerce; Interior Department; Wage and Hours Division. Department of Labor; Interstate Commerce Commission; Federal Trade Commission; Pure Food and Drug Administration; Federal Security Agency; Civil Service Commission; Central Intelligence Agency; Federal Communications Commission; Post Office; and a number of other commissions and agencies.

State Government

In the state government, which is closer to the individual citizen, there are many positions which call for an investigative background. State civil service commissions or personnel bureaus use investigators to check on applicants for state posts; state liquor authority investigators check on applicants for state posts; state liquor authority investigators check on compliance with liquor laws and on applicants for liquor licenses; state motor vehicle bureaus have a staff of investigators. State insurance and banking departments use investigators with backgrounds in those fields. Conservation departments; state highway departments; public works; state tax bureaus also have investigative staffs. In every state, the department of labor has important functions in investigating violations of labor laws, and state licensing agencies investigate applicants of various kinds for state permits.

investigators associated with the welfare and relief functions of the county; investigators assigned to county hospitals and homes; investigators working for the board of assessors, and others.

City Government

In a typical city government, the investigators and inspection staff make up a considerable part of the municipal payroll. Health department, welfare department, board of education, finance department, sanitation department, board of elections, bureau of weights and measures, department of markets, license department, hospitals department, municipal courts, municipal civil service commission, and public utilities bureau are among employers of investigators. In larger cities, you will even find a separate Department of Investigations, which operates under the executive or legislative branches of the city government to investigate the operations of city agencies or conduct special investigations.

In addition to the investigators employed by government agencies, there are many semi-governmental organizations which also provide careers in investigation. The functions of International Red Cross agents are largely investigative. Societies for the prevention of cruelty to children employ investigators. Many Congressional committees need investigators for special assignments, and state legislative committees often receive appropriations for the employment of investigators. Investigators are also found on the staff of the United Nations.

Appointments to investigate positions in government service are usually obtained through passing a competitive examination, or by appointment on the basis of previous training and experience. While a number of investigative posts in public service are still subject to patronage, their number is decreasing; more and more are being placed under civil service appointment procedures each year.

In the appendix of this book you will find a typical examination for a municipal investigator's position. After reading this book, try the test, and see how your answers compare with the official answer sheet.

OPPORTUNITIES IN PARTY INDUSTRY

What are the opportunities for an investigator in the business world? In a recent survey, this writer found salaries ranging from 94 cents an hour being paid by a protective service, to a high of well over $20,000 a year which was received by the protection head of a department store. Many young investigators find themselves confronted by the same dilemma facing beginners in every other field of endeavor. Employers seem to want men and women with some experience; they won't hire a person without experience and give him a chance to obtain it.

Fortunately, in investigation, there are many opportunities for part-time work. Many persons, who have started out with a vague interest in becoming an investigator, have been able to gain experience by part-time work after school or another job. Thus, after serving an apprenticeship in that way, they have been able to obtain full-time employment.

The "help wanted" columns of newspapers often carry ads asking for part-time investigators, and these are usually open to persons with little or no practical experience in the field. Many lawyers will give a young person a chance to try his hand at investigation. Sometimes a local loan company or bank will provide the opening breach into the field.

The following list will provide the investigator with a guide to employment opportunities, but it is far from a complete listing of the various business and industries which use investigators.

Banks, credit agencies, retail credit bureaus, installment houses, private detective agencies, protective services, attorneys, personnel offices of industrial plants, finance companies, department stores, hotels, insurance clearing houses, insurance companies, reporting services, better business bureaus, railroad companies, steamship companies, local transit companies, airlines, gas and electric companies, legal aid societies, welfare organizations, automobile associations, political parties, telephone companies, newspapers, race tracks and the Thoroughbred Racing Protective Association, mutual stores associations, large real estate firms, and many others are on the potential employer list.

For the individual who wishes to prepare himself through training for work in investigation, there are schools in several cities which offer courses in investigation, and a number of colleges have departments offering specialized work in this field. In addition, there are a number of correspondence schools which offer instruction through the mails, but their emphasis is generally on the criminal branches of investigation. An excellent course emphasizing the military aspects of investigation is offered as part of the Army's Reserve Corps Correspondence Training Program.

HOW TO FIND A JOB IN INVESTIGATION

The young person who has chosen to make a career in the profession of investigation is fortunate in that he, or she, has selected a field in which a desire for advancement and a genuine liking for the work are more important than any formal training or preparation. And there are few barriers in investigation. Persons of every age, color, religion and race are engaged in this work. In fact, membership in some minority racial group often is an asset to the investigator, who will find his entry made easier because of his ability to make contacts that would be more difficult for a person who could not find common grounds with the sources of information and the people he encounters in the course of his investigation.

Almost every type of prior experience will be found helpful to the investigator. A young man who had been a short-order cook found that this experience helped qualify him for work as a traveling inspector for a chain of food shops. Those with retail experience will find that the retail surveys and shopping services are constantly seeking people with just that background. Men and women with industrial assembly-line and warehouse experience fit naturally into industrial undercover assignments. A former bartender is now engaged by a hotel chain to check on their bartenders. Truck drivers and transportation workers find their services in demand by companies which specialize in transportation investigations.

TYPES OF EMPLOYMENT

The field of employment open to the investigator is vast, but he should consider his personal assets and aptitudes, and decide which particular branch of investigation would seem to give him the best possibility for a fruitful career. For the purpose of considering some of the major types of employment in investigation, the following outline will indicate what a part of the field offers:

HOW TO APPLY FOR A POSITION

When you have checked through the list above and found the field that appeals to you, the next step should be to start on a campaign to get hired. Use the local telephone directory for a list of prospects and then you can either set out on a round of personal calls or launch a letter-writing campaign.

If you decide to go out in person, dress neatly and conservatively for your interviews. It is important to avoid exaggeration in discussing your own background and abilities with your interviewer. Most investigative agencies prefer to hire a person with an interest in investigation and then train him in their methods. If you have a typewriter, make out a one-page description of yourself that you can leave after the interview so that they can keep your application in mind if you are not hired immediately. There may not be an opening at the time.

In writing a letter of application, it is important to stress what you can offer your employer—not what he can do for you. A plea in your letter that you are anxious to become an investigator means little to the man who receives it; but a well-written letter which outlines your education and experience (especially any experience which fits in with the type of investigation you are seeking), should bring the desired invitation to come in for a talk.

Most of the national agencies have their main offices in New York City, and a letter to the personnel manager of the main office will be forwarded to the branch office near you if it arouses the interest of the executive who receives it. Some of the larger agencies in the investigative field are:

Hargrove Secret Service, 331 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

GET ON THE SHOULDER

Displays of wildflowers are calling many motorists to the highways these days, especially on week-ends and for them the California State Automobile Association has some pointers.

1. It's all right to drive slowly enough to see the scenery, but you have no right to dawdle on a busy road.

2. When you drive, do the driving and let the passengers do the looking.

3. If you want to look at the flowers or the scenery yourself, get off the road, onto the shoulder or a designated viewpoint, and do your sightseeing.

The CSAA also suggests that many of the best displays are not on view from main highways and that back roads and by-ways are not only less crowded and more comfortable for sightseeing but frequently offer other compensations as well as superior displays of wildflowers.

"Split second action may save your life!"

Amos E. Crowl, manager of the San Francisco Auto Dealers Association, reminded motorists of this fact in stressing the importance of driving a mechanically perfect car.

Crowl lauded the vehicle maintenance program conducted here by the local Chapter of the National Safety Council, Association members, and official agencies.

"More than 2500 accidents were caused in San Francisco last year by defective motor vehicles," Crowl said. "Safety Council records show that these dangerous vehicles claimed three lives and injured nearly 200 persons."

"Obviously," Crowl added, "any driver—even a very skilled one—is helpless in a sudden emergency if his car has worn brakes, a defective steering mechanism, or some other dangerously weak or worn part."

Crowl joined police and Safety Council spokesmen in urging all motorists to have their cars thoroughly checked during the month. He advised car and truck owners to pay particular attention to the following points: brakes, tires head-lights, rear and stop lights, wheel alignment, exhaust system and muffler, windshield wipers, glass, horn, and the rear-view mirrors.

"It is the responsibility of every truck and auto owner and driver to know the exact condition of his vehicle. An emergency may arise at any second—and if your car isn't ready for it you may lose your life."

NEW STAFF MEMBER

Francis J. McCabe, 45, retired chief of the Maine State Police, has joined the field staff of the Traffic Division of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, Evanston, Ill.

Franklin M. Kreml, director of the IACP Traffic Division, said that Mr. McCabe will serve as liaison officer with the police association's State and Provincial Section. Specifically, he will work with the general chairman and regional chairman of the IACP State and Provincial Section in developing programs for the annual and regional meetings of the Section; maintain a file of information on state police and highway patrol activities, and serve as a field consultant to Section members. He will work under the director of field service for the IACP Traffic Division, George C. Bowers.

6. Number of courses in which the officer may enroll is optional. An officer may enroll in one course or he may enroll in as many courses as he desires (unless class enrollment has been closed), but must attend all classes on any one subject in which he enrolls. No student is permitted to leave an incomplete subject under one instructor in order to attend some other class conducted at the same hour or over-lapping.

7. Notebooks and Notebook Paper. Officers must provide themselves with the 8½ x 11 inch size, three-ring, hard-back notebook and paper for same, fountain pen, or pencils. It will be found that the loose leaf letter size, that is, 8½ x 11 inch, hard-back binder, will be the most practical type for keeping notes. Notebook paper will not be provided at the school.

8. Officers enrolling in the Institutes who will require room and board must make their own arrangements for same, or, if they will so indicate on their application for enrollment, the Supervisor of Peace Officers' Training will endeavor to provide information as to living accommodations.

9. Additional information relative to the schools will be mailed as it is prepared. Upon receipt of applications, additional information will be mailed directly to the applicant.

10. Officers and instructors should attend the graduation dinner on the last day of each two-week training session, at which time completion certificates will be awarded.

11. To assist you in your selection of courses descriptions of the courses and class schedules are included in this announcement.

POLICE ORGANIZATION AND ADMINISTRATION

A twenty-hour course. This course will include a discussion of the functional and procedural principles involved in the over-all administration of the average police department. It will deal with the organizing of staff and line, providing proper type of leadership, analyzing the qualifications necessary for staff officers, handling personnel problems, and building improved public relations.

Pushing another car, which has displaced towing it in many an emergency, is not harmful to the mechanism of the vehicle during the pushing if it is driven carefully, advises the National Automobile Club. PATROL AMBULANCE

A versatile ambulance, police emergency vehicle and patrol car suitable for use in small communities as a combination unit or in metropolitan cities as an auxiliary emergency car has been introduced by Studebaker.

Slight changes in the interior arrangement also make the vehicle ideal for use by hospitals as a private ambulance. Funeral homes that offer ambulance service can quickly replace the regulation emergency equipment after the vehicle has been used as a flower car or general service car.

For industrial use, all emergency equipment, including siren, beacon, and four-wheeled cot, can be removed in a few minutes to convert the ambulance into a personnel carrier.

According to state police who were consulted on design requirements, the Studebaker vehicle is ideal for highway patrol duty because of its balance at high speeds, its comfort, and ease of handling. Also it has ample room to carry all of the special equipment required for accident investigation work, emergency treatment of ill or injured persons, plus room for a standard ambulance cot.

Police were especially enthusiastic about the ease with which a patient can be placed in and removed from the vehicle.

Interior specifications allow a wide latitude of choice in the type of emergency equipment that can be installed. For example, two-way radio units can be placed over the transmission housing for easy access, and operated from the instrument panel. Mounting plates can be placed in numerous locations for such items as oxygen tanks, rescue tackle, or auxiliary flood-lighting equipment.

The ambulance is modified from a Conestoga station wagon. Both front and rear seats are of the divided type, and the rear seats fold down in the conventional manner. When the right section of the rear seat is raised, it provides space for a medical attendant at the head of the ambulance cot. With both rear seat sections raised, there is room for three passengers.

Zipper openings in the flax vinyl headliner provide easy access to mounting bolts and wiring that connect the revolving beacon and siren on the roof. A two-way toggle switch cuts out the conventional horn and allows the siren to be operated from the horn ring during emergency runs. A spring actuated bridgeboard covers the gap between tailgate and floor so that one man can easily roll the ambulance cot into position and lock it into the carrier brackets.

AND THEN THERE WERE NINE

By WALTER R. HECOX

The murder of Arvid Benjamin Ostlund was by no means a spectacular crime. It was instead a sordid affair which, without considerable research into the victim's background, lacked the qualities of human interest which cause homicidal blood lettings to be splashed across page one of the public prints. Ostlund's history would have been hard to dig up at the time of the killing. In fact no one knew who he was and, with the exception of the late Sheriff William Elam of Placer County, California, no one seemed to care. Murder is always important to a peace officer. Elam worked hard on the case of Arvid Ostlund. And he had not worked at it long when he discovered the murder had a peculiar significance.

The body was found adjacent to the Southern Pacific right-of-way just east of the Roseville city limits by a group of railroad track workers who have since become anonymous. Their names are not important anyway, because there is little likelihood that the murderer of Ostlund will ever be tried for that particular crime. His victim was lying in a sleeping position on a pitiful nest composed of a bundle of thin, although clean, blankets. His head had been thoroughly crushed and a large, bloodstained rock the shape and size of a football, which was lying nearby, spoke eloquently of its part in the demise of the wanderer. Later in the day Sheriff Elam weighed the rock and discovered it weighed twenty-six pounds.

Of course, there were no means of immediately identifying the man. If he carried any personal identification it had been removed by the killer. The motive was obviously robbery, although it was also obvious that the victim's death was by no means an accident. He had not been struck once and robbed. The stone had descended many times, until Ostlund's skull was literally crushed to a pulp.

There were other strange aspects to the case. The body was cleaner than that of the usual bindle stiff found dead in a hobo jungle. The dead man was living apart from others of his calling, evidently preferring a solitary existence to the companionship of his fellow knights of the road. His hands were calloused, giving mute evidence that he had been recently employed at hard physical labor.

The corpse was about thirty-six hours old at the time of its discovery. In fact it was the odor of flesh decaying in the warm sunlight of early July, 1951, which led the track workers to it. However, Sheriff Elam found it possible to take fingerprints. They did not check with any in his file, so he forwarded them to the California Bureau of Criminal Identification and Investigation, together with the other facts of the case and a request for whatever help the agency could give him.

The prints were forwarded to a modus operandi technician who checked them, discovered the victim had been arrested once for violation of railroad laws, and identified him. He forwarded the information to a senior M. O. technician, who glanced casually through the folder at first. Murder, being the peculiar type of crime it is, rarely repeated and therefore the method in which the crime is committed is seldom important except in cases where the degree is important. This was obviously first degree, and ordinarily would not have occupied the technician's attention too long. After reading the case, however, he did a sort of silent double talk. He read Sheriff Elam's report a second time, paying particular attention to the way the crime was reported, then sat quietly at his desk, staring into space and tapping a pencil on his blotter pad. After a few moments he crossed the room to a special file and removed an armful of bulky folders. He spent the next few hours going through them all carefully. When he had finished he picked them all up and walked into the office occupied by Ralph Davis and Barney Huse, top investigators for the CII.

"Well, gentlemen," he announced. "We've got another one. Take a look at this homicide report from Sheriff Elam up in Placer County."

The investigators studied the folder, which was now earmarked "Ostlund," carefully, but waved aside the other folders.

"I don't need them," Huse commented. "I know them by heart."

When they had finished reading the Roseville report Davis looked at Huse somberly.

"He's still operating," he declared.

Huse nodded. "He will be until we get him. And that's going to take some doing."

"We've got to do something," Davis observed. "This can't go on."

"Sure we have to do something," Huse replied. "But what? How do you get a killer who finds his weapons lying by the railroad track and kills a bum nobody knows for the few dollars he has in his pocket, unless you catch him in the act. And if you catch him there won't be any murder, so he'll take a short rap in the pen and we'll never be sure we have the right guy."

"It has to end," Davis insisted. "There must be a way to do it. Let's go see the chief."

George H. Brereton, head of the C.I.I. bureau of the California Department of Justice, was familiar with the cases presented to him a few moments later by Huse and Davis. He read the report of the latest murder and then turned to his deputies.

"Well, we know he was in Roseville a few days ago," he said. "What are you fellows going to do about it?"

Davis shrugged. "What can we do about it?" he inquired. "We make all the routine checks, do everything we should do, and so do the local officers. But nothing happens. This fellow is like a ghost. No one knows what he looks like or why he's so bloodthirsty. He seems to kill men as nonchalantly as the average man swats a fly. By the time the body is found he's on a freight train and a few hundred miles away. What can we do?"

Brereton frowned. "It will be tough," he replied, "but this must stop. This man is as bad as Jack the Ripper." He paused and gazed reflectively at the Ostlund folder. "The first thing we are going to do is get some help. I'll call a meeting."

A casual observer standing outside the massive building which is known simply as State Office Building Number One in Sacramento might have thought a police officers' convention was in town on the morning of July 18, 1951. Twelve investigators representing five counties and the Western Pacific Railroad were clustered outside the stately, granite portals. But there was none of the jocularity evident which is prevalent during an average conclave of policemen. They filed soberly into the building and were taken to the fourth floor where ten state investigators, headed by George H. Brereton, awaited them. The C.I.I. chief called the meeting to order.

"You all know why you are here," he told them. "We are facing a situation which is, I believe, unique in California history. Somewhere in this state right now there is a man at large who has less respect for human life than the average one of us feels for a mosquito. We have on record in our files eight murders which possess seven common characteristics. These crimes are so nearly identical in character that our modus operandi experts tell us they must have been committed by the same man. We have to catch him, and it's going to be a tough job.

"I want you to understand that this is no run of the mill criminal on the rampage. These killings have taken place over a period of years by a predatory human being who destroys his victims for the few dollars, or cents, they might have in their pockets. There appears to be no motive for his crimes other than robbery.

"Our MO men have studied his methods and discovered this common pattern for his killings: One; they are all male, ranging in age from forty-five to sixty-nine. Two; callouses on their hands show they are all working men who have recently been employed at hard physical labor. Three; they were, in a sense, hobos, but they lived apart from the other men in the jungles or traveled by themselves. Four; all them were cleaner about their clothing and their persons than the average bindle stiff. Five; they were all killed by blows on the head. Six; in every case the initial blow was struck from behind or the side. In many instances the victim was sleeping at the time of the attack. Seven; the beating around the skull of the victim invariably continued until after the reflexes were stopped. The killer obviously wanted to do a thorough job.

"There is another peculiarity in these cases which must be considered," Brereton continued. "Most hobo jungle killings are brought about by quarrels over liquor, drugs or sex perversions. There is no evidence that any of these is a factor in the crimes this man has committed. Naturally this will make the job of catching him doubly tough. There have been no witnesses to any of his murders. No one has ever seen him who knows what he has done. At least none have lived to tell the tale. He is a literal will-o-the-wisp. A sort of vampire of the hobo jungles. Just how we will get him I don't know. But we have to do it."

"I called you together because there has to be a pattern," he concluded. "All of you have had at least one killing in your jurisdiction. It may be that we are missing something. Perhaps one man was seen in each area at the time of the murders. Maybe he left a trademark of some kind. There could be one essential clue we are all overlooking. At any rate I want all of us to review these cases together. Maybe we'll turn up something that has been missing so far. We will examine them piece by piece. At least we'll get a start."

The meeting which followed Brereton's opening statement was one of the strangest in the history of California law enforcement. The story which unfolded there was one of the most startling in the time, the beginning of the tale went back a decade.

It started near Caliente, Nevada, back in 1942 when the nineteen-year-old son of a Shoshone Indian woman acquired a pistol. He put it to immediate use, and a few days later the victim of a one thousand dollar robbery in the Nevada desert positively identified him as the man who held him up. The young Indian was sent to the Nevada State Prison in Carson

City for twenty years after being convicted of highway robbery. He served four years of the sentence and was paroled. At twenty-three his outlook on life was no better than it had been at nineteen, but he had learned a lesson. A lesson he paid for with four back-breaking years in prison... and a lesson others were to pay for later. It was not the sort of lesson parole boards would approve of.

Life was tough for the young Indian after he was turned loose. He did not want to go back to the Shoshone reservation. He was half Mexican and did not feel at home there. Anyway, by nature he was a wanderer. A hobo's life was natural to him. He followed the shining steel rails from town to town and job to job. Seasons meant nothing to him. Time was meaningless. It was peach picking time, or cherry season, or time to go south and harvest cotton. The only time which meant anything to him was that which he spent in prison. There was plenty of that. In 1948 he was sentenced to the federal prison at McNeill Island for counterfeiting and later he was sentenced to a sixty-day term in the Sacramento County jail for vagrancy. He escaped from the county road camp almost immediately.

Lloyd Gomez was a rugged, mean customer when he made his break for freedom from the Sacramento County jail. He had lost all taste for hard physical labor. He would work if he had to, but not for long. Before long he found a new way to get money. He never got much, but he didn't need much in a hobo jungle. He discovered the system almost by accident. A flash of inspiration struck him one day while he walked along a mountain path above Oroville, California.

The Indian who had asked him to his cabin to share a bottle of wine with him was a likeable enough man. Actually Gomez liked him. But as he walked along that lonely mountain path he realized he did not want the wine. There were other things he would rather have. A good meal for instance.

He studied the old Indian carefully. The fellow was dressed neatly. He had been able to afford a bottle of wine. Probably he had a little money on him. Not much, but enough. But robbery was dangerous. He could probably overpower the man and take his money, but he had learned his lesson in Nevada. The Indian could identify him and he would wind up back in jail. But there was a way. He remembered an old saying. Dead men tell no tales.

Gomez hesitated, a strange, tingling feeling running through his chest to the tips of his fingers. He knew he was going to do it. He had to. The urge to kill ate at his mind like a loathsome cancer. The trail was rocky. Heavy, granite rocks lay all around him. He picked one up, testing the solid weight. An admirable weapon. A fool proof weapon. He rushed forward, swinging the heavy stone.

It crashed solidly against the back of the old Indian's head. Gomez heard the sound of cracking bones and splattered flesh. The Indian dropped like a log. Probably the first blow was enough to kill him. But Gomez did not take a chance. The rock smashed down again and again, crushing the old man's head to a bloody, shapeless blob of flesh. The aging body twitched and quivered in its death agony, then lay still. The rock continued to pound. Finally Gomez stopped. He tossed the stone into the bushes. Then he placed his head by the man's chest, listening for a heartbeat. Satisfied at last that his victim was dead he reached for the pocket-book, then grunted with disgust. The friendly Indian had been the proud possessor of five cents.

Gomez dragged the body deep into the bushes, then covered up his trail coming out. He walked leisurely back on the trail over which he had come. In Oroville he caught a west bound freight. Soon there were miles between him and the scene of the crime. When the train crossed the Feather River he dropped the pocketbook into the water, after he had pocketed the nickel, of course. Then he leaned back against the wall of the gondola he had picked to ride in. He did not feel good or bad. There was no sensation at all, except a little disappointment at the lack of money. After a while he went to sleep. Lloyd Gomez had embarked on a new career. But first he had to know if he was hunted.

Months passed. The killer roamed over California, drifting from one jungle camp to another, watching the papers. Finally he saw the news he was looking for. The decomposed body of an unidentified man was found in the hills above Oroville. Authorities believed he had been murdered. The dead man's skull had been shattered. They were attempting to identify him.

Gomez waited. Nothing happened. No one was looking for him. There was a safe way to commit robbery. All he had to do was keep moving.

May 29, 1950. Elmer M. Cushman swung aboard a Western Pacific gondola headed for Stockton. He did not like riding this way, but there was not much choice. There were only twenty-six dollars in his pocket, and he had to live until he could find work. Bus or train fare from Oakland to Stockton would take a big bite from that small stake.

Cushman picked the most comfortable place he could find and dusted it off carefully with his handkerchief. He had learned long ago that it paid to look the best you could when you were looking for work. He settled down and rolled a cigarette. After a while the train pulled out from under the fog into the sunlight. Cushman was comfortable. It was warm and pleasant. He drifted off to sleep.

In the car behind his a slim, stealthy body moved with catlike quiet along the floor of the empty gondola. Slowly, ever so carefully, the strange, human animal lifted his head above the steel rim of the car. He peered into the next truck. At first he thought it was empty. He started to climb in, then drew back suddenly. He had almost stepped on the still form of a sleeping man.

For a moment he hung on the rim of the gondola, staring at the quiet form underneath him. Cushman did not look like the run of the mill knight of the road. His clothes were cleaner than usual and he seemed fairly well fed. More than likely there was money in his pocket-book. The newcomer remained motionless for a while, considering the situation. There was a way to find out if there was any money on the sleeping man. An easy way.

He glanced about the empty car he had been about to leave. A length of two by four caught his eye. It was a husky piece of pine, just long enough to make a good club. He picked it up and felt its weight, then glanced around. No one was in sight. The train crew was apparently all back in the caboose. He climbed back to his former position and dropped soundlessly into the gondola occupied by Cushman. The sound of the rolling wheels masked any disturbance he might have made. The two by four lifted high over the head of the sleeping man, then crashed against the undefended temple. Again and again it smashed against the head of the helpless man, crushing it to a shapeless pulp. Elmer Cushman gasped and struggled for a moment, then lay still. The beating continued until the last reflex stopped. Then the killer paused. He listened for a heartbeat. There was none. The job was well done. Next he examined the dead man's pockets. The operation was profitable. The total take was twenty-six dollars. He crouched, apeline, in the rear of the car, grasping the club firmly, prepared to defend himself against any intruder. A few miles further on the train slowed for an upgrade. He swung up to the side of the gondola and dropped off into the bushes, rolling away from the road bed. As the freight rolled on he sat watching it until it was out of sight, fingering the money in his pocket. It had been so easy. No one could ever catch him. He did not feel any sympathy for Cushman. All in all he felt that his fellow traveler was better off. Life was no good anyway.

Early on the afternoon of November 11, 1950, Warren Hood Cunningham sat outside the cardboard shack his friend Joe Kapuska had erected close to the railroad trestle in the sprawling hobo jungles north of Sacramento and listened to the radio. The two men huddled close to a small fire and enjoyed a minor luxury in the life of vagrant. They spoke in low tones, watching the threatening late fall sky and wondering if the steadily rising waters of the nearby American River would overflow their banks soon and flood them out of their paper jungle castles.

A slim, unshaved figure appeared from under the railroad bridge and walked along the riverside path. He glanced at the pair briefly, then hastily looked away as he balanced precariously on a pair of two by fours which topped a deep ditch running toward the river. Cunningham watched him as he walked past. There was a light of recognition in his eyes.

"Hey," he said to Kapuska. "Isn't that the guy?"

Kapuska, better known in the hobo jungles as Joe Cabbage, shook his bearded head. "What guy?"

"The one that swiped my beer and sandwiches yesterday."

"I couldn't say," Joe Cabbage answered. "You know I can't see myck."

"It's the guy all right," Cunningham muttered. "I'm going to make him give it back." He rose and called to the stranger. "Hey you!"

The slim figure started to run. Cunningham followed him, hurling curses after his fleeing foe, but he was no match for the younger man's speed. After a while he gave up and returned to the fire. "At least now he'll know he can't steal things around here and get away with it," he told Cabbage.

The stranger ran a considerable distance. He did not tire easily, and he did not want to tangle with Cunningham face to face. He ran almost a quarter of a mile before he slowed his pace to a fast walk. Cunningham had given up the chase long ago, but he continued walking fast the remaining half mile to his own nest. Then he lay down on his blankets, thinking, grimly angry.

Three hours passed. The stranger had not moved, except for his left hand, which was absent mindedly caressing a twenty-two caliber rifle he had purchased a few days earlier. There were shells in the rifle. He could fix Cunningham's bacon with that gun. The sun peaked through a veil of clouds over the western horizon. It would be dark soon. The slim stranger arose and moved off, taking the gun with him.

He did not go directly to Cunningham's shack. There was too good a chance that he might be observed. The other side of the levee which was close to his shack was by far the safer route. He moved silently along the bank, once again a weird, hunting human animal. When he reached the railroad bridge he cut down into the ditch which he had crossed on a pair of two by fours a few hours earlier and moved stealthily along it. His feet got a little wet, but he did not mind. The important thing was the job at hand. No one could cross him and live.

A clump of trees just west of Joe Cabbage's shack shielded him nicely. He crept out of the ditch and into the thick brush under the trees. The two men were still sitting by the fire. It would be so easy. He lifted the rifle and took careful aim, then fired three times as fast as he could. Cunningham slumped forward, then rolled over on his back. Joe Cabbage did not move.

The killer stalked contemptuously out of the bushes and walked past Cabbage to the body of the other man. He pressed the rifle barrel against his victim's head and fired three more times. The job was done. He glanced at Joe Cabbage speculatively, then shrugged his shoulders. The aging Russian was frozen with fear. Besides he was half blind. The killer walked off. About a mile away he tossed the gun into the tules and continued to the railroad. He caught a freight bound for Stockton almost at once.

The next day he read about the killing. The newspaper story told how Joe Cabbage had run to the shack occupied by Mike Gilbert, caretaker of the nearby Robinson dumps, and how in turn Gilbert had notified the sheriff. The story said they were looking for the murder weapon.

The killer considered this seriously. He had made a mistake. Suppose they should find the gun, hidden in the tules. Maybe they could trace it to him. Still, there was little chance that they could find it. But it was possible. The thought haunted him.

Three days later he caught a north-bound freight. He dropped off in North Sacramento and proceeded immediately to the jungle. The gun was easy to find. But he couldn't be seen there carrying a gun. It had to be eliminated right away. He had provided for that.

From a jacket pocket he produced a stolen hacksaw blade and started to work. It took a long time to finish the job, but when he was finally done he had four neat pieces. They fit into his jacket pocket. Once again he caught a south bound freight. As the train passed over the Cosumnes River, about twenty miles south of Sacramento, he dropped the pieces into the water. He rode south as far as Bakersfield. Now let them catch him.

The desert, California's endless miles of sagebrush, sand, rock, and Joshua trees, stretched out before him. It seemed a likely retreat. Inwardly he cursed himself for using a gun on Cunningham. They could trace a thing like that. Some people knew he had owned the gun. Suppose one of them talked. But there was little danger. No one knew him well. All they could do was describe him. He wandered out into the desert.

He got as far as Mojave, a sort of jumping off place beyond Bakersfield, when he met the man who refused to give him a match. No one will ever know just why Earl Franklin Woods refused the request, but people are in general agreement that he had a right to do so. Perhaps, however, he would not have been so hasty with his refusal had he been aware of the peculiar attitude toward life entertained by the man who accosted him. At any rate, he would have been more careful thereafter. As it was, he just kept on walking down the tracks.

The killer, his hands already elbow deep in blood, stared somberly after Wood's retreating form, literally growling with rage. There were a lot of rocks near the tracks. He picked one up and overtook the other man soundlessly.

Once again a heavy bludgeon made contact with an undefended skull. Woods dropped in his tracks, but the killer worked on, long after his victim was dead. When it was over he dropped the rock by the roadbed and listened for a heartbeat. Then he dragged his victim into the bushes. A short time later he caught a freight for Los Angeles.

The Mojave desert is not a place where a person can hide a body near anything so public as a railroad and hope it will remain hidden long. Wood's body was found almost immediately and Southern California police took prompt action. Lloyd Gomez was arrested as he stepped off the train in the Los Angeles freight yards.

Hard working policemen questioned the suspect for three days. At the end of that time they realized that all they could prove was that Gomez had been aboard a freight train which had come to Los Angeles through Mojave. They realized a murder conviction would be almost impossible to get on such a thin strand of evidence, so three days later their prisoner was released with reluctance.

For a few months Lloyd Gomez and the world lived in peace. The narrow escape from justice in Los Angeles had been too much for him. Apparently things like that are inclined to tone down a man's killing habits. At any rate the series of bludgeon deaths in hobo jungles stopped briefly. It was not until June 9, 1951, that he stumbled across the man sleeping near the Santa Fe Railroad tracks near Stockton. He was about a hundred yards from the roadbed, sleeping in an improvised nest of blankets just west of the city.

The sleeping man looked prosperous, as hobos go. Gomez considered the situation. Night was falling. The area was deserted. There were hundreds of people who looked like him in Stockton for the fruit harvest. Anyway, they hadn't come close to getting him in Los Angeles. He knew they were just guessing.

There was a two by four and large rock nearby. He used them both. It was over quickly. He was getting to be an expert at bashing in human skulls.

He had been right about the man's prosperity. There were twenty dollars in his shirt pocket. He transferred the money to his own jeans, tossed the two by four into the nearby slough, and continued on his way.

The twenty dollars was a good stake for a hobo. It lasted almost two weeks. Gomez did not feel the urge to kill until he boarded a freight car near Merced and met friendly, despondent George Jones.

Jones included a bottle of wine in his meager possessions. He sipped at it slowly, trying somehow to bring some sweetness into his life through the sugar content of muscatel. He offered Gomez a drink, but Lloyd refused.

The two men talked a lot. They agreed that life was not good. It was too tough, too hard to make a living. As Jones sank further into his cups he confided in Gomez. In face he declared that he was tired of living.

"I wish that someone would knock me on the head and drop me on the tracks in front of the train," he admitted. "I'm tired of this life."

There was a gleam of humor in Gomez' eyes, but Jones did not see it. Before long he finished the wine and dropped off into a slightly alcoholic slumber. Gomez waited until he was snoring, then he went to work. Once again a two by four was lying nearby.

No one can say Lloyd Gomez was not obliging in the case of George Jones. He hit the despondent traveling man right where he had indicated, not once but a dozen times. But he was wholly cooperative. He did not drop the body on the tracks. Instead he removed sixteen dollars and fifty cents from the dead man's wallet and threw the wooden weapon away. The train was nearing Merced. He dropped off about a mile from the city limits. A little later he climbed aboard a northbound train. The world was full of escape routes.

The case of Arvid Ostlund in Roseville was not much different from the others. The victim was sleeping peacefully when Gomez almost stumbled over him. Ostlund looked prosperous and there was such a nice, fat rack nearby. Gomez estimated later that it weighed twenty pounds. At any rate it was effective. It took fewer blows than usual to kill the sleeping man. But he had guessed wrong from a money standpoint. Ostlund's pockets only yielded one dollar.

The death of Ostlund was immediately responsible for the extraordinary meeting called by George Brereton on July 18, 1951. The meeting, together with the description of the crimes which the killer had committed were publicized throughout the state. Gomez read of the mysterious killer without emotion. He doubted that they would catch him. According to the story they had been looking for him a long time without success. Besides, they were not one hundred per cent right. Some crimes mentioned by Brereton he had not been responsible for.

It was peach picking time when he arrived in Marysville. Early August. Gomez was flat broke. He was a little bit desperate when he threw sand in the eyes of the man on the banks of the Feather River, then crushed his skull with a brick. He found the technique quite satisfactory, however. The brick was effective weapon and the victim died quickly. The job was not profitable, though. All he netted was twenty-one cents. He hopped a southbound freight in search of greener pastures.

Ray Chester Hansen hopped aboard a steel gondola as it pulled out of Modesto on the night of August 16, 1951. It was a balmy evening, too hot for those confined to houses. The music of the rolling wheels was almost a lullaby. Hansen fell asleep almost immediately. He was resting peacefully when the slim figure slid over the edge of the gondola and dropped inside. As usual there was a two by four handy. Gomez went right to work. A few moments later Hansen's head was crushed beyond recognition and the killer was richer. But not much richer. The take was less than five dollars.

The next morning Sheriff Don Cox of Sacramento County and his men discovered they had a murder case on their hands. The only trouble was the body was found in a railroad car and they could not tell what county it had been committed in. Sheriff Cox called Barney Huse of the C.I.I. and Sacramento County was officially invited to enter the chase for the mysterious jungle killer.

Huse and his partner, Ralph Davis, had been working almost endlessly on the mysterious will-o-the-whisp of the hobo trails since the July meeting. Little by little they had compared notes, collected evidence and examined witnesses until they had almost been able to construct a visual image of the phantom killer. Suspects were arrested and released. Each month they felt they were hotter on the trail, but they never quite attained complete success.

The year 1951 passed without any further jungle deaths following the murder of Hansen. Huse and Davis wondered if their phantom had left the country. Then the break came in a way which astounded all of California.

Early in January a slim man, violently angry, was collared by a Sacramento policeman while chasing another man down an alley in the city's west end with a wine bottle. There was no doubt about the pursuer's intentions, but the only logical complaining witness had kept right on running after the policeman intervened in his behalf. The net result was that all the Sacramento police could charge the culprit with was vagrancy. He was sentenced to serve sixty days in the Sacramento County Jail. His name was Lloyd Gomez.

There was a scuffle in the county jail shortly after Gomez was imprisoned, and the new inmate came out of it on the short end. As he sat in his cell, fingering his newly scarred nose, a peculiar bitterness overwhelmed him. He thought of the man near Merced who had been tired of living. Finally he asked the jailer for a pencil and a piece of paper. Guard Joe Perini produced the needed materials. The prisoner took them and started writing immediately.

The note was short, but it was hard work for the poorly educated hobo. He labored on it for a half hour before handing it back to Perini.

"This is for the head jailer," he instructed.

Perini looked at the envelope. It contained four words. "Too jailer." Then, "Lloyd Gomez."

Undersheriff Harry Knolls, a small, bespectacled little man whom many claim is Central California's outstanding peace officer, was sitting at his desk completely wrapped in the complex problems of running a large sheriff's office when Perini approached him.

"One of the boys in the jail asked me to bring this to the head jailer," he announced, grinning. "I guess that's you."

Knoll returned the smile. "That's me all right," he replied, taking the note.

The undersheriff adjusted his glasses and read the message. He chuckled to himself when he was half way through.

"Boy, this guy is really ready for the booby hatch," he announced to the world at large. Then he finished reading the note. When he read the last line his smile changed to a frown. He reread the message, still frowning, then got up and entered another room. He handed the paper to a detective.

George L. Louderback read the message, then laughed heartily. "Boy, I've seen a lot of men blow their tops while they were in the clink, but this one has gone all out. He's really nuts."

"I don't know," Knoll declared. "Read the last line."

Louderback glanced back at the note, then frowned. "You mean that guy out in the hobo jungle. What was his name?" He paused and started searching through his files. His partner, Melvin Reese looked up.

"You mean Cunningham," he announced.

"That's right. Cunningham. He was shot six times all right. It won't hurt too look into this angle. The guy is probably nuts, but who knows?"

"How would he know the guy was shot six times?" Knoll demanded.

"He could have read it in the papers," Louderback replied. "Anyway, we might as well question him."

"You and Reese get started," Knoll instructed. "I'm going to take this note to the Sheriff."

Sheriff Don Cox, like the others before him, was inclined to laugh at the note at first. It was incredible. It read:

"All in California," followed by an illegible date.

"I killed one Indianmen ORovill, 1951."

"I killed one White men at Marysville
"I killed 1 men at roseville 51

"I killed 1 man at Stockton

"I killed one man at merced

"I shot 1 men 6 time in jungile Sacramento."

The note was signed, "Lloyd Gomez."

By the time Sheriff Cox and Knoll entered the room where Louderback and Reese were interviewing the prisoner they discovered the detectives' skepticism had changed to amazement.

"He knows every detail of the case," Louderback told Cox. "We're checking him with our file. He must have done it."

Gomez continued talking. When he had finished he had outlined every small detail of the murder of Warren Hood Cunningham. He was taken to the scene of the crime and there he showed the detectives things which only the killer could have known. Later in the day Mike Gilbert, who had called the police, identified him as having been in the area that day. A second man corroborated his testimony. Joe Cabbage, because of his poor eyesight, was not able to identify the man. However, he was able to tentatively identify the voice.

Sheriff Cox called Huse and Davis. The two C.I.I. men hurried over to question the killer. They too discovered that the man knew and remembered details which only the murderer could have been aware of in the six crimes he had listed. They probed his memory and discovered there were three crimes he had committed he had neglected to list.

"A man can't remember everything," Gomez complained. Then he proceeded to give minute descriptions of the killings. He even remembered a pair of trousers he had left on the train with Hansen.

"There is a patch on the leg," he told officers. "It's a darker brown than the pants."

Knoll unrolled a package. The dark brown patch was there. At the end of the day Huse and Davis were convinced they had their jungle killer.

"He has cleared up at least six of the eight crimes we knew about. The others could have been done by other men," Huse announced.

During the days that followed the Sacramento County Sheriff's office became a sort of convention headquarters for policemen in the far west. To Knoll it seemed that every sheriff west of the Rockies wired inquiries to him. Gomez stubbornly maintained, however, that he had only killed in California. As time passed he outlined his crimes to the officers of the affected counties, each time with astounding accuracy. The improper dates were the only flaw in his accounts.

A peculiar situation existed in the case of Gomez. Although he has confessed to nine murders, he can only be tried for one, or at most two at a time. The officers have decided to try him first on the charge of killing Cunningham because, no matter whether Gomez recants some time in the future or not, they have a strong case against him.

"It was the one time he departed from his faithful modus operandi," Huse explained. "Normally he never killed in front of witnesses or with a gun. The gun and the witnesses mean the end of him."

There seems to be little likelihood that Gomez will recant, however. When asked why he suddenly confessed he shrugged his shoulders and remarked. "I don't know. I guess I'm getting weak."

The gas chamber? It does not seem to worry the killer. 'Life is no good anyway,' he insists. "It is the best way out."

A short time after his confession, Knoll was discussing the case with a Sacramento reporter. "It's funny," he remarked. "If Gomez had killed one more man we would have had a repetition in real life of the poem. Remember it? Ten Little Indians."

The reporter looked thoughtful, then grinned. "It almost works the other way around. Try this one. Eight little hobos, buried in a line. Gomez found a big rock and then there were nine."

Gomez was executed early this year at San Quentin prison.

SUMMER IS CRITICAL

With schools closed for summer vacation, children naturally are on the streets a greater portion of the time, playing, going to and fro and even running out into the thoroughfare from their playgrounds. As a result, accident rates involving boys and girls have shown an upward trend during vacation months for many years past.

The California State Automobile Association points out that as a result of this increased exposure to hazard, motorists must accept additional responsibility for driving safely in areas where youngsters are likely to be encountered. The Association also reminds parents that they can assist in promoting the safety of their own and the neighbors' children.

Urge your children to play in the yard rather than on the streets. Park your car in the garage instead of leaving it at the curb; children who dart out from behind parked cars are exposed to danger. Locate the nearest park or playground and teach your children the safest route to follow in going there. Do not send children on errands which require them to cross busy streets.

EMERGENCY BRAKES

On many makes of automobiles it is good practice to apply the foot brake before setting the emergency brake, advises the California State Automobile Association.

Not only is it easier to set the emergency brake securely when the foot brake is being applied simultaneously, but there is less chance of straining the emergency brake mechanism.

Also, if brakes are not in tip-top condition, there is some possibility of air entering the system, thus reducing brake efficiency, when the foot brake is not first applied.

This procedure does not apply on cars equipped with emergency brakes that operate on the driveshaft.

Grotz, field representatives of the National Safety Council, Chicago.

This was the sixth year that the International Association of Chiefs of Police has honored police agencies for excellence in traffic work. The awards are based on evaluation of enforcement reports of cities and states in the Annual Inventory of Traffic Safety Activities. Twenty per cent of the total scoring credit is allocated to facilities and methods and 80 per cent to actual enforcement performance. Evaluation is guided by recommendations of the Enforcement Committee of the President's Highway Safety Conference and the Traffic Committee of the IACP, and by comparison with performances reported by other cities and states. Evaluation information is provided by the National Safety Council, administrative agency for the Annual Inventory.

Judging of the National Traffic Safety Contest is based on overall traffic safety activities of cities and states, as submitted in reports to the Annual Inventory. Winners of the 1953 National Traffic Safety Contest were announced earlier this month.

have appeared before in the winner's circle in their various divisions and groups.

Oklahoma has been the most consistent winner, having taken a first-place award every year since the competition was established. Los Angeles and Washington, D.C., have won four previous awards, and Dallas and the States of Washington and California, three each.

HEEL AT WHEEL

Are you a heel at the wheel?

The Me-First—this is the selfish competitive character who must be first away from the traffic light, can't stand to have anyone pass him, and risks the life of anyone who gets in his way.

The Big 1—this is the fellow who is too big for the rules. Others can obey the law and a code of decent and courteous behavior, but not this self-inflated big shot. He's above all that.

The Know-It-All—this driver is good, in his own estimation. He knows just what the other driver is going to do, just how fast he can stop, just how much room he needs to cut in on another car. But the only way this over-confident jerk escapes painful disillusionment is that the really good drivers give him a wide berth.

The Swashbuckler—this fellow thinks he expresses his masculinity or something by living dangerously behind the wheel. He believes that he who hesitates is lost, and that his luck will hold forever.

The Sorehead—this fellow is just plain hostile. He drives with a chip on his shoulder and is ready to lock fenders for any real or imagined wrong. He's sore at everyone, and very brave while surrounded by a steel automobile with the windows rolled up.

The Show-Off—this is the exhibitionist. He's graduated from no hands on a bike to no sense at the wheel. He just wants people to admire his flashy performance, but most other drivers are too busy getting out of his way.

Take a good, long look at yourself in one of these mirrors. See anything?

TIE THAT GRINDS

It really doesn't matter much which of two cars reaches an intersection first, says the California State Automobile Association. It's the tie that causes trouble. Let the other fellow have the right of way; it costs less than fenders.

WARNING SIGNALS

When you see the amber traffic light flash on, it's time to stop, asserts the California State Automobile Association. "Trying to beat the red light" is a prolific cause of accidents.

PHYSICIAN IN COURTROOM

"Physician in the Courtroom," first volume in Western Reserve University's new Law-Medicine Series, will be issued June 20 by the W R U Press.

Publication date coincides with the opening of the Institute of Science in Law Enforcement, which will bring nearly 100 law officers to the Western Reserve campus, Cleveland, Ohio, for the week-long program.

In the 98-page book "Physician in the Courtroom," four W R U faculty men who are leaders in their fields comprise a symposium to discuss problems of the medical profession as related to the law.

Contributors to the discussion are: Dr. Clinton DeWitt, professor of law at Western Reserve; Dr. Samuel R. Gerber, coroner of Cuyahoga County (Cleveland), Ohio, and a associate in legal medicine on the staff of the W R U Institute of Pathology; Dr. Alan R. Moritz, director of the Institute of Pathology; and Dr. Lester Adelson, deputy coroner and chief pathologist in the Cuyahoga County coroner's office, and instructor in legal medicine at the Institute of Pathology.

Opening section of the book is by Dr. DeWitt. In Medical Ethics and the Law he discusses the physician's dilemma brought about by his dual allegiance to his profession and to the cause of justice in the courtroom. Divisions of the DeWitt article include the physician's duty relating to public health and to crime; civil liability for breach of secrecy and defamation of a patient; and absolute and conditional immunity.

Coroner Gerber writes on Expert Medical Testimony and the Medical Expert. Beginning with a history of forensic medicine, he moves to divergent philosophies of medicine and the law, pre-trial conferences between members of the two professions when involved in a legal case, and includes hypothetical questions and an outline of rules of conduct during such a case.

Medical facts for lawyers involving cancer and heart disease are covered by Dr. Moritz and Dr. Adelson. Dr. Moritz' chapters are on Trauma and Heart Disease, while Adelson's contributions concern Injury and Cancer.

"Physician in the Courtroom," first of Western Reserve's legal medicine volumes, will be followed within the next 12 months by "Medical Facts for Lawyers" and "Homicide in the Urban Community." Copies of the initial publication are now available, at $2 each, from the Western Reserve University Press, Western Reserve University, Cleveland 6, Ohio.

CHP TRAINING PERIOD

"So you want to be a state traffic officer?"

This question received an affirmative answer from thousands of ambitious young Californians last year and the first results of the questioning will be seen in July when 80 prospective officers report at the California Highway Patrol's modern Academy for a gruelling three months training period.

The 80 are the first called from the eligibility list established by the State Personnel Board following the last state-wide examination which attracted more than 5,000 applicants. After a rigid weeding out process, a strict written examination, a careful personal analysis and a physical check-up, fewer than 600 of the original number survived. The 80 are part of the 200 additional officer personnel allowed by the legislature at this year's session and it is planned to complete the training of the entire 200 before July 1, 1955.

Today's traffic officers come from all walks of life and from all parts of the state. All have had at least a high school education and a number are college graduates. Many are veterans.

Before they get on the job, however, they will go through a course of training covering 54 subjects, all related to some phase of their future work. Experts from within the Patrol and outstanding representatives from federal, state and private agencies are on the Academy faculty, all working on a curriculum which has received highest praise from educational as well as law enforcement leaders. Traffic laws, court procedures, first aid, unarmed defense, accident investigation, public relations and many more subjects fill the hours and evenings of the men who for 12 weeks will eat and sleep in the group of new buildings six miles south of Sacramento.

Their assignments following training will be determined on various factors including high accident frequency and critical manpower shortage.

"Naturally we are pleased to have the 200 additional men the legislature granted us this year," said Commissioner B. R. Caldwell. "However, that number will bring the total Patrol uniformed personnel to only approximately 1700, far too few for efficient handling of California's serious traffic accident problem. We need at least another 1,000 men to give the type of protection necessary in a state with more than six million vehicles travelling nearly sixty billion miles each year.

"So far in 1954 our rural accident picture is encouraging but we cannot relax.

AFRAID OF THE DARK?

Afraid of the dark? It's a good idea.

When night falls the traffic death toll shows a sharp increase—both in rural areas and in cities, according to reports compiled from throughout the nation by the National Safety Council.

"The fatal accident rate is three times as great during the hours of darkness as in daylight hours. This means that, despite the vastly reduced travel at night, three out of five traffic deaths happen between sunset and dawn," states Arnold E. Archibald, president of the Council's San Francisco Chapter.

Archibald cited two violations of traffic laws as being the principal factors in the high night-time traffic toll. Failure to dim lights is a leading cause of crashes during the hours after dark, Archibald said. (Section 649.b, California Vehicle Code, states: "Whenever the driver of a vehicle approaches an oncoming vehicle within 500 feet, such driver shall use a distribution of light or composite beam so aimed that the glaring rays are not projected into the eyes of the oncoming driver . . .")

Too much speed for night hours—over-driving the headlights—is the top cause of night-time highway tragedies, the safety leader asserted.

"Most drivers consider that if a speed of 55 is a safe speed in daylight hours, the same speed is all right at night. This is not the case, however, as has been proved by the nation's top test drivers under varying conditions on carefully prepared proving grounds. Actually, if a maximum speed of 55 m.p.h. is considered safe for daylight driving, this speed should be reduced at least 10 miles per hour after dark. In rainy or foggy weather an even greater reduction should be made," Archibald said.

Archibald also warned that lights are supposed to be turned on between one-half hour after sunset and one-half hour before dawn during clear weather. Section 618.a of the California Vehicle Code states: "Every vehicle upon a highway at any time from a half-hour after sunset to a half-hour before sunrise and at any other time when there is not sufficient light to clearly see any person or vehicle on the highway at a distance of 200 feet shall be equipped with lighted lamps and lighting devices . . ."

NATURAL BRIDGE

Natural Bridge, located fourteen miles north of Payson in Arizona and three miles from the main highway, is reported by the National Automobile Club to be the result of a limestone formation having been worn by erosion. It is a scenic wonder that yearly attracts many tourists.

GROWING OLDER

"The older people grow, the older they want to grow."

This statement is based on a recent California Highway Patrol survey into ages of drivers involved in accidents, and the violations responsible.

The survey, conducted during March, 1954, indicates drivers between 18 and 22 live most dangerously or at least have the highest percentage of accidents. Fifteen per cent of all traffic crashes where violations were committed found a driver in the 18 to 22 age bracket at fault.

People between 38 and 42 were responsible for 9.3 per cent of the accidents caused by violations, and drivers 58 to 62 years of age were held accountable in only 3.1 per cent of the cases. One person, aged 87, was cited for speeding after an accident.

Survey results again show excessive speed as the most dangerous factor in traffic. Speed was the violation responsible for 32.9 per cent of all accidents studied. Second most dangerous driving error was violation of right-of-way, accounting for 13.4 per cent of the accidents. Improper turns ranked third, causing 8.5 per cent of the collisions.

A native of Dover, New Hampshire, Mr. McCabe was graduated from the University of Maine in 1932 and joined the Maine State Police in 1934. He attended the first traffic police administration course at the Traffic Institute of Northwestern University in 1936-37 on a fellowship provided by the Kemper Foundation for Traffic Safety.

He was director of the Division of Traffic and Safety of the Maine State Police from July, 1937, until he entered the Army in November, 1940. He served as provost marshal and did public safety work in this country, Canada, and in the European theater of operations. He was released from active duty as a lieutenant colonel in October, 1945, and returned to the Maine State Police.

In April, 1946, he was granted a leave of absence to become warden of the Maine State Prison. He served in this capacity until October, 1948, when he returned to the State Police as chief.

Active in the International Association of Chiefs of Police, Mr. McCabe has served as regional and general chairman of the IACP State and Provincial Section and as a member of the Association's International Relations Committee.

He is a graduate of the Harvard Medical-Legal School of Police Science.

guarded crossing in the 31 years since it was organized.

Joseph R. Knowland, California State Automobile Association Public Safety Committee chairman, presided. Among the distinguished guests he introduced was Governor Goodwin J. Knight who reminded the Patrol members:

"Safety is not a luxury—it is a necessity. Keep up the good work. Keep safe."

District Attorney Thomas C. Lynch, speaker of the day, told the Patrols:

"You are here to receive the thanks, congratulations and tribute of the people of San Francisco for a job well done."

Superintendent of Schools Herbert C. Clish and Reverend James N. Brown, archdiocesan superintendent of schools, both warmly commended the youthful traffic specialists for their fine work.

Police Inspector Thomas B. Tracy, who is in charge of training the Patrols, and his assistants, Sergeant Matthew Duffy, and Officers Philip Lindecker and Charles Maggioncalda, led the parade.

After the eleven battalions had passed in review, the Efficiency Awards, provided by the California State Automobile Association, were presented to the winning Patrols by Deputy Chief of Police George Healy representing Chief Michael Gaffey, Colonel of the Patrol Regiment.

Chief Gaffey in a public statement paid tribute to the Patrol boys and girls. He said:

"The School Safety Patrol is the most effective safety movement ever developed to protect children from traffic hazards. Loss of life and limb among our school-age youngster would be appalling without it."

The review ceremonies began when Rabbi Elliot Burstein, chaplain of the San Francisco Police Department, offered the invocation. Gary Stroth of the Mission Dolores School Safety Patrol then led the assemblage in the Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag.

The Patrols were drilled for the review by R.O.T.C. instructors from the Public High Schools under the direction of Major John J. MacArthur.

Music for the marching battalions was provided by four bands under the supervision of Charles M. Dennis, Director of Music, San Francisco Public Schools.

Among the guests of honor in the reviewing stand were J. Warnock Walsh, president, H. C. Maginn and Washington I. Kohnke, members Police Commission; Mrs. Clarence Coonan, member, Board of Education; Mrs. Tony Patch, vice president and Mrs. Dirk van Ekelenburg, safety chairman, Second District,

FIRST GRADUATES

May 14 marked the graduation of the first group of men to complete a full course of professional, in-service training in the licensing of drivers.

Thirteen men from 13 states—Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Montana, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Texas and Vermont—who have attended a four-year series of courses in driver licensing conducted by the American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators received graduation certificates today from the Traffic Institute of Northwestern University.

Along with 13 other men enrolled in the three-week course, "Examiner Records and Their Uses," these students represented 25 states and Canada, and are responsible for the licensing of approximately 35 million drivers.

Tuition scholarships for each session have been given the students by the Farmer's Insurance Group Safety Foundation, Los Angeles.

L. S. Harris, executive director of AAMVA, was the guest speaker at a luncheon for the graduating examiners held at the Orrington Hotel in Evanston this afternoon.

Discussing driver licensing, Mr. Harris said: "Great expenditures for the improvement of both highways and motor vehicles have been undertaken in the past to decrease the accident rate and increase traffic safety. In recent years, however, it has been increasingly realized that the improvement of the driver is equally, if not more, important to the improvement of safety records. We believe that if all drivers were as good as the best, traffic accidents in the United States could be reduced by more than 90 per cent."

The three courses in the series given earlier were: "Standards for Driver Examinations" in 1951; "Administration of Driver License Examinations" in 1952; and "Selection and Training of Driver License Examiners" in 1953.

J. Stannard Baker, director of research for the Traffic Institute, who was instrumental in the development of this four-year program said: "These 13 chief examiners represent close to 25 percent of the country's chief examining officers. This is a significant accomplishment in the professional training of the nation's top examining personnel."

"This training program for chief examiners has been split into four three-week units because the men can rarely be spared from their jobs longer," explained Glenn V. Carmichael, director of the course. Mr. Carmichael is a member of

Three short courses for police will be conducted at the Traffic Institute of Northwestern University in Evanston this fall.

They are: Police Traffic Training, an introduction to police traffic supervision, Sept. 13 to Oct. 1; Accident Investigation, Administration and Techniques, Oct. 4 to 22, and Traffic Law Enforcement Administration and Techniques, Oct. 18 to Nov. 5.

Important areas of management will be covered during the week in which the accident investigation and traffic law enforcement courses overlap. These areas are offered for both courses at the same time because the management principles apply equally to both fields of police work.

The Police Traffic Training Course gives a broad description of the traffic problem, indicates those who are responsible for reducing accidents and relieving congestion, and gives particular emphasis to the role of the police in this field.

All three courses are part of a series of integrated short courses developed by the Traffic Institute to train key police personnel in specific traffic functions.

The training program now includes 60 hours of Federal Bureau of Investigation training, covering general patrol duties, observation, mobile arrests, house searches, crime scene searches and so forth. The men have also received a two week course in police administration.

Captain Webb, who was a sergeant until February, 1954, was promoted to his present rank within thirty days after Chief Berlin took over. The 50 hour work week then in effect was reduced to 48 hours.

The city council at present has under consideration the request for two additional patrolmen, pay increases and one additional automobile. About 200 investigations a month keep the little force busy. Arrests average about 60 a month not counting parking or traffic violations.

A more rigid training program has been planned for the next six months including a course on narcotic investigations.

Since Berlin took over the department he has installed a new records system which can be expanded from 10,000 to 100,000 cards without exorbitant expense. Prior to February only arrest records had been kept by the department.

Berlin gives credit for his career to Chief Al Huntsman of Santa Cruz who, he says, always made the best training program on the Pacific Coast, available to all his officers.

no prep school, however. He attended the Federal Bureau of Investigation National Police Academy in Washington and returned well versed in up-to-date methods which would improve the San Joaquin County Sheriff's office.

Canlis first turned his attention to the Bureau of Identification which had long been a matter of pride to the Stockton law enforcement agency. The bureau is one of the oldest in the state. Its records include the first police identification photographs ever taken, including the historical prints turned out by Captain I. W. Lees of the San Francisco Police Department in 1855. The records have been kept with painstaking care ever since. But this was not enough for Undersheriff Canlis. Under Sheriff Sousa's direction he installed a modern filing system, purchased new equipment and placed carefully trained men in charge of it. Today, under the direction of Lieutenant P. M. Morton the bureau is ranked with the best in California and bow to none in the nation.

Politics have played no part in the way Sousa runs his office. The only yardstick by which a modern San Joaquin County Deputy, or office hand, is measured is by his or her honesty or efficiency. If a man has what it takes, he gets somewhere.

To supplement his none too large department, Sheriff Sousa has organized and maintained a force of reserve deputies which is today the office's pride and joy. There is no swearing in of informal deputies in San Joaquin County. In case of emergency, Sheriff Sousa can call on an organized reserve of trained, high quality men who will supplement his own organization with equal knowledge and ability. Selection is the Sheriff's main problem with the reserve. There are plenty of volunteers, but few men who are willing to meet the rigid requirements set up by Sousa. A reserve deputy on Sheriff Sousa's force must take the same indoctrination course as a regular employee, he is subjected to the same rigid discipline and must serve on active duty for a limited number of hours each month. Even then only a few of the volunteers are chosen. Only the best men are picked. Sheriff Sousa's reserve force includes everything from professional men to laborers, but each one must meet the same high standards.

A sore point in the office from the Sheriff's point of view is the county jail. As recently as last November a bond issue to provide funds for a new one was turned down by the voters.

"Fifth and last item on my program was increasing mobile patrols for the protection of the County's unincorporated areas. Three were put into operation, in addition to the three which already existed. When the Sheriff's Office went on a 40-hour week in July, 1953, these patrols had to be called in, and money has not thus far been provided to re-establish them.

"Racketeers have not been permitted by my office to operate in Fresno County, and they will not be. I have suffered the indignities of unscrupulous political attempts to get me out of office, but the most brazen of these was thrown out by a jury of my peers after long, extensive and expensive hearings.

"There will be no preventable racketeering in Fresno County as long as I am Sheriff. Of this, these undesirable elements may be dead sure. If I am re-elected I shall continue to do an honest job as Sheriff-Coroner, with all the ability at my command, and without fear or favor."

PISTOL POINTING

in the first relay Ed has three misfires so with curses and groans swears by the nine gods that never, never again will cleanliness spoil his day's shooting—and his scores.

Nels Hansen, the retired Navy CPO, is now on his way to the old country with the Mrs. As you might guess Nels is heading toward Denmark and is aboard an English freighter via the Panama Canal. Nels states for the press that he is not taking his guns with him. Knowing the gent as I do that is a very hard story to swallow. I think one now is supposed to say bon voyage—so be it.

Two gents that I know of were very unhappy at the matches Sunday and all due to, let us say, "faulty ammo". (That's as good an excuse as any.) Len Richardson, from Burlingame had a nice miss in the slow fire string of the 2nd match for an 82. Then it happened. A 98 in both the timed and rapid fire string. Curses, cusses and gazooks!! In the .22 National match Jim Dwiggins from the Vallejo Police Department starts off with a nice 65 in the slow fire string then a couple of 92's and plenty of bad, bad words.

I take it that Jim Magee likes his beer warm. Jim buys a bottle the first thing in the a.m. and sticks it in his pocket, uncorked, of course. All day long

Jim sips his suds and seemingly likes the stuff with the contented horse temperament. Ugh.

According to the new 1954 hunting laws any lad under the age of 16 must now have a license and certificate from a certified instructor that the youth has had the proper grounding in the handling of firearms and the safety rules pertaining to hunting. As firearm safety education is now an integral phase of outdoor education in California it is encouraging to note that the program is meeting with much enthusiasm throughout the state and this type of instruction (which by the way is all voluntary) will have much to do with the cutting down of accidents through careless handling of firearms. A lot of sport minded and safety individuals have taken upon themselves to be a "big brother" to these young Dan'l Boones and "learn 'em how to shoot" a gun or pistol without danger to himself, his companions and the public. It is the dream of every boy to have a gun for his very own and it is our responsibility as adults to educate him in the proper handling of that "very own" gun. One of our pistol shooting gang has taken this to heart and has already started two classes in San Mateo where he is having a lot of fun for himself and giving the boys the know-how the next time they go out with dad on a hunting trip. I specifically speak of Mike Carrol, who is pictured above with a group of excited youngsters listening, and learning, the fundamentals of gunning. Mike sez the classes are getting larger and tho he feels all he can properly handle is 12 boys to a class he sees that in the near future more classes will have to open up. It's guys like Mike that keep sports going. Thanks, Mike, for the swell job you are doing.

Walt Frey brought along his 7 year old son, Freddy, and spent most of the day blackening the sights on Freddy's Hop-A-Long Cassidy gun. Later Walt confidentially told me he should have used the kid's gun because the one he was using wasn't shooting too good and his scores were veddy, veddy what you might call LOUSY!

And how the mighty have fallen—speaking of weight. Gus Corneer is now down to a mere shadow of the Empire State building having dropped 65 pounds. Gus is now just a few pounds lighter than a small freight car and still tips the Fairbanks at a close 267.

Young Johnny Faletti was quite disturbed at not being with the men Sunday but the doctor said Johnny couldn't do any shooting. It was a kindly gesture on

"Don't get me wrong," Sheriff Sousa remarked. "Our jail is a good one. And believe it or not it is always spotlessly clean. But it was built more than half a century ago for a maximum of about seventy prisoners. At times now we have hundreds in it. The problem is a serious one. But jails are the hardest thing in the world to get money for."

Early in his career as Sheriff, Sousa enlarged and improved the prison system. He acquired 360 acres for the prison honor farm and completed the erection of a modern kitchen and dining room which can accommodate 400 men. To these he added dormitory buildings with modern facilities where men serving time for misdemeanors are provided the best in housing and recreation. The farm includes a dairy building, a processing plant which takes care of the vast vegetable crops raised there, clean and sanitary pens and corrals for more than 100 swine and over 20 head of dairy cattle, a smokehouse for curing pork for other county institutions and a machine shop. There are no fences around the farm and escapes are few.

Sheriff Sousa's record for honesty and integrity has been outstanding among peace officers throught the country. In San Joaquin County no one has ever had the temerity to hint that he was not doing the best job possible. Even his political foes can only say, "Yes, he is doing fine. I would just do it different." A weak argument at election time at best.

He kept his promise to the late Sheriff Martin Ansbro when he told him he would run a clean campaign. When Ansbro died and he stepped into his shoes he filled those of a fine man. And he continued to make his word good. He kept the office both clean and progressive. The results have been outstanding. To date he is the administrator of an office which contains as fine a group of peace officers as there is in the state.

The names of Canlis, Captain Denzel Trout, and Lieutenants Morton, Joseph Hagengruber, Andy Tickvitz, William Kates, Elmer Briscoe, Loren Brown, Allison Johnson, Frank Esau, Ivan Commons and all others are known far beyond the limits of San Joaquin County. The old mentor has coached himself a good team. Why did he switch from recreation work to a peace officer's job?

"Well, I'll tell you," Sousa explains. "I always wanted to be Sheriff. It's a good job. I like it."

The old coach acts like he likes it.

hats. Second, there is one group of men in San Francisco who seem to work, summer and winter, in snap brim hats and topcoats. They are the members of the Inspectors' Bureau of the Police Department.

Miller reentered his room, grabbed the Luger with his free hand, searched briefly for his thirty-eight but could not find it, dressed, and headed for the rear door. He was halfway down the back steps when he saw the figure of a man, flashlight in hand, below him.

The hophead's shot was well aimed. Dennis Bradley never knew what hit him, although he lived for hours. As the heavy slug coursed through his cerebellum and ripped out his neck the inspector took one step back, staggered, turned, and fell soundlessly to his left side.

Six feet behind the fallen policeman Heeg caught sight of a head and shoulders, whipped a .25 automatic from his pocket, and snapped a shot at the gunman, darting for the cover of the garage as he did so. The heavy roar of the .41 answered his shot, followed by an empty clicking noise. Heeg, thinking that Miller's gun was empty, moved forward and the .41 spoke again. He staggered back as a slug ripped downward through his coat and rear pants pocket.

The sound of a falling body drew his next shots. He emptied the small caliber gun at the noise, then drew his service .38. Another noise in the direction of the fence drew his fire, just as Zimmerlin and Girard dashed out the rear door. There were more shots, a yell of anguish, and Girard tumbled to the ground, moaning in agony. Heeg dashed across the yard to the spot where he had heard the last noise, caught a fleeting glimpse of a figure scaling a second fence, snapped a shot at it, then turned to help his companions.

Harold Miller knew he was in a worse jam than he had ever experienced in his trouble studded life when he saw Bradley fall. There was no doubt in his mind that his victim was a policeman and little that he was dead. He answered Heeg's shots, heard the click of the empty chamber which told him two bullets were gone, jumped over the stair railing to get the protection of the staircase, fired one more shot at Heeg, and headed for the fence. He was scaling it when Girard and Zimmerlin burst into the area. He emptied his gun at them, heard Girard's shout of pain, and headed toward the second fence. Just as he topped it Heeg fired his final shot. Miller fell heavily to the ground on the other side, dropping the empty .41 as he did so but clinging to the Luger. For a moment he was convinced he was hit. The wet, sticky fluid seeping through his left sleeve and coat had to be blood. It was not until he had scaled a third fence that he realized he had tumbled into a muddy puddle of water. He headed down Richland Street at top speed, then south on Murray.

John Foran and Leo McCarthy, two recent veterans of Korean combat, presently enrolled in the University of San Francisco, were sitting in Foran's 1951 Oldsmobile talking over classroom problems when Miller's frantic figure appeared on the street. The fugitive spotted them, stopped, rapped on the glass with the Luger, and indicated that he wanted to get in the rear of the car.

Foran and McCarthy had little choice. Each had seen all the shooting they wanted for quite a while. McCarthy, whose left leg was covered from thigh to ankle with a heavy plaster case . . . a souvenir from his Korean fighting days . . . was incapable of resisting and Foran could do nothing without endangering his friend. He unlocked the door and let the gunman in.

Miller stepped inside, crouched on the floor, and flourished the gun. "Get going," he ordered.

"Where?" Foran inquired.

"Anywhere," Miller told them. "I'm in trouble. Bad trouble. I'll use this if I have to. Now get moving."

Foran was flustered. He pressed the starter button and the little motor moaned, but nothing happened. He tried again. Still the engine refused to catch. Finally Miller's hand shot across the seat to the dashboard.

"The key belongs there," he stated, twisting it to the "on" position. "Now try."

The motor caught and came to life. "Head for Mission Street," Miller ordered.

Foran obeyed. When he reached Mission, Miller ordered him to turn south. After they had crossed the city limits without encountering a road block all three men sighed with relief. Foran and McCarthy because they had been sure they would be caught in a gun fight, Miller because he believed he was closer to freedom.

"Where are we going?" McCarthy wanted to know.

"Los Angeles," Miller replied. "Turn on the radio."

Foran turned on the radio just in time to catch a news bulletin telling of the shooting of Bradley.

"That's me they want," Miller declared. "Keep that thing on and don't try anything funny."

It was a long, tedious ride. Foran, not wanting to attract attention that might be fatal to either a policeman or himself, drove thirty-five to forty miles an hour throughout the four hundred mile trip. At three o'clock Miller ordered the radio turned off. Bradley was still alive and Girard's wound, which was through the foot, was deemed painful but minor. Shortly after three o'clock Bradley died, but Miller did not know it.

At twelve noon the following day the trio arrived in Los Angeles. Miller had bought gas twice and they had eaten, but because of McCarthy's leg the gunman had managed to remain in command all the way. He ordered Foran to proceed to the theater district and get out of the car. As he left he produced a five dollar bill.

"Here's a fin for gas," he told them. "Now how about giving me a break. Just give me a chance to get away. I didn't mean to shoot that guy. Honest I didn't."

As Miller disappeared in the midday crowd, Foran and McCarthy headed for the Hill Street Police Station.

Inspector Tom Cahill and Ralph McDonald of the San Francisco Homicide Detail took up the search for Harold Miller immediately after news of the shooting reached police headquarters.

Hour after endless hour passed as they worked without rest, determined to track down their fellow officer's killer. Radio and television broadcasts told of the event and flood of tips reached police headquarters, each of which had to be checked out. Road blocks were stationed on every major highway. By the time Bradley died hundreds of Bay Area policemen were working on the case. The two inspectors were exhausted when the teletype came from Los Angeles shortly after noon the next day. The message was brief. It declared that Miller was in the southern city and that every available man was on the job.

The message did not exaggerate. Chief W. H. Parker detailed five hundred men headed by Captain Jack Donahue to the search. Radio stations and television stations broadcast descriptions of the killer at hourly intervals. Hundreds of plain clothes men scoured the hotel and theater district. Two detectives were stationed in each theater. Among these were James Brady and Wilbur Ulmer.

They arrived early in the afternoon, told the manager their purpose, and asked to speak to the usherettes.

"Watch for anyone sleeping," the girls were told. "If you see anyone asleep, take a good look at him. If he resembles this picture," they passed around a photograph of Miller, "let us know at once."

The usherettes promised to cooperate. Shortly after six o'clock one of them approached the officers.

"Your man is in my section," she told them. "He's sound asleep."

"Keep your eye on him," the detectives ordered. "We don't want to take him in here. Someone might get hurt. Let us know when he's awake."

At 7:20 p.m. the usherette reported that the fugitive was awake and stirring. The two officers stood as inconspicuously as possible at the base of the stairs leading to the balcony. A few moments later Miller came down. There was no missing him. Brady and Ulmer followed him from the theater. A short distance away they approached him with guns drawn. Brady's gun was in the fugitive's stomach and Ulmer's in his back before Miller could react. They forced him into a doorway which, incongruously bore a sign inviting passersby to "sit down and relax".

Miller did not relax. He waited tensely for the officers to search him and when Brady produced the Luger, he sighed. "You've got the right guy," he admitted.

Miller was taken to the Los Angeles Police Academy where Cahill, who had flown to Los Angeles to take part in the search, Captain Donahue, and a court reporter recorded his full confession.

Three months later Miller was found guilty of the first degree murder of Inspector Bradley plus six other felonies ranging from kidnapping to the illegal possession of firearms by a convict. He was sentenced to life imprisonment by Superior Judge Eustace Cullinan.

IS SUNNYVALE RIGHT?

By BILL WALKER

Can one individual competently qualify as both policeman and fireman in two such highly specialized fields? This is a popular argument surrounding the move recently by the City of Sunnyvale.

The combining of the police and fire departments under one department has recently been worked out in Sunnyvale, California. An officer of the law is not only required to fulfill his police duties in combating crime but he must be equally skilled in combating fire.

Much "hala-baloo" has been heard on this unique system but as can be expected separate departments of police and fire in the neighboring communities insist on their individuality. They refuse to believe that a policeman could fulfill the duties of a fireman and that naturally a fireman lacks police "know-how."

Various policemen in the surrounding areas of Sunnyvale were asked their personal opinion on the combination police and fire department. Many opinions were given on this matter however it was soon discovered that few wished to be quoted.

The San Jose Police Department supplied considerable opinion in this small survey. Sergeant Elmer Klein in his own views unknowingly expressed the general opinion of many in the area. Klein felt that the two fields were too highly specialized for one man to adapt to his fullest ability in each department. It takes years to become a fully experienced fireman—mainly due to lack of fires with which to obtain actual experience. Aside from the actual fighting of fire, there is the department of fire investigation which in itself is a highly trained and specialized field.

In police work men spend four and often many more years of study in the field of police procedure. Considering this phase alone it is apparent that considerable training in both fields would be necessary to obtain a high degree of efficiency.

It is the opinion of many that the Sunnyvale system is perhaps practical in a small town, where the need for fire fighting and police patrolling is somewhat limited.

The following are quotes taken from various police officers in the communities surrounding Sunnyvale.

"Never had any contact with it, would not definitely know how it would work."

"Perhaps a small town could use it to save money."

"Small town OK but large city not too good."

"Takes too much training."

"Policemen fight crime and firemen fight fire, it's best that way."

"Oh, brother—I'd quit the police force and go into the street department if it ever comes to San Jose."

"It's just impossible to do a good job in both fields."

"I just hope it stays in the town of Sunnyvale."

"With the proper personnel it may be very practical."

"Sunnyvale seems to like it, especially the taxpayers."

Willard Schmidt, well known director of the San Jose State College Police School, expressed the combination in Sunnyvale as an administrative technique, a technique that may save the taxpayers money and increase the efficiency of the departments.

The problems to be considered are the saving of taxes versus efficiency.

1. If this step taken by Sunnyvale costs the taxpayers less and maintains its previous rate of efficiency it is bound to be a popular move.

2. If it costs the taxpayers less and increases the efficiency then by all means it's a good thing.

3. If, on the other hand, taxes are less at the sacrifice of efficiency it is not good.

4. If taxes are the same and efficiency less—still a poor move.

5. If taxes are the same and efficiency increased it is good and if taxes are the same and efficiency the same, then why change?

Increased efficiency can be obtained by training courses given to each member of the department. Perhaps in a few short years policemen will take comparable firemen training courses in college. Under such a program the graduate would be well qualified in both fields.

These are a few of the logical reasons given by Director Schmidt in analyzing the move Sunnyvale has made. Perhaps this survey has a strong flavor of disapproval to ward such a combination, but it was our intention to present the opinions of the policemen in surrounding areas and give you a slanting view from the policemen's side.

TRAFFIC TOLL

Traffic accidents in San Francisco up to August 1 claimed 45 lives and caused injury to 3,541 persons, the San Francisco Chapter of the National Safety Council reported today.

Nearly 500 of the injured persons were critically hurt, the Chapter report showed.

Arnold E. Archibald, Chapter president, stated: "If the present trend continues through the next five months, 40 more people will die and nearly 3,000 will be injured."

Archibald urged pedestrians to "be extremely careful when crossing streets."

"Jaywalking and walking against traffic signals is a major cause of death and serious injury in local traffic," the safety leader noted.

From August 1 through December last year, 32 people were killed and 2,728 were injured. Twenty-three of the dead and nearly 1,000 of the injured were pedestrians, the Safety Council reported.

THE SAN FRANCISCO MATCHES

As you have probably heard, the June 20th matches held at the S. F. Police range were the last matches to be held there for about a year. As the city of S.F.'s budget is made up previous to July 1st each year there have been no appropriations of do-ri-me to hold matches for the 1954-55 fiscal year which means that the matches could not be held before July of 1955. If you think the shooters are not disappointed about that state of affairs then old boy, you had better take another look. That leaves only the Oakland Club sponsoring matches for that period. It's true there are other matches in San Jose and Stockton but they are not generally patronized by the shooters. It sure is a darn shame that the finest range in the whole country will be tied up for public matches for a whole year and I know that there are many shooters trying to see what can be done for the 1955-56 year. Cheer up, my fellow paper punchers the cause is not all together lost and a year is a long time and much can be accomplished in 12 months.

Perhaps another bit of news to the shooters is that in all probabilities that was the last official shoot "POP" Dutil will be with use as the range master. He is about to take an early retirement and sit out the rest of his days in peace and quiet. (Wanna take a bet? Two to one Pop is back with us in a few months but not as a range official but as one of the shooters. Because if I knew Pop then he just couldn't stay away from any spot where the handguns are popping!) Pop tells me he has looked forward to this day of retirement with longing eyes and it never seemed to be getting any nearer until one day it was almost on top of him and then he got what we call butterflies and he isn't too sure now that he wants to retire. He wishes that he could turn old Father Time around for a spell and head him in the other direction for a couple of years as it is one of the hardest decisions of his life to make — either he sticks it out a couple of years longer or calls it quits. It seems quite a simple task for you or me to make up our minds now that we don't have to retire but when it's time to give the final word, oh, brother! Leaving so many friends and good times is like giving up his right arm—and you know Pop doesn't want to do that. There is no use in me trying to give Pop a big slap on the back because everyone who has had contact with him will be more than willing to do that but he does wish to express his deepest regards to all the shooters for their co-operation and loyalty without which the range wouldn't be what it is today. There will be no good-byes and no so-longs because we all know that "POP" Dutil will be with us again. A new rangemaster will step in and keep things rolling in the personage of Jim Martim. Next issue I'll tell you about Jim.

"Y" know, officer, I was just watching something like this on TV."

The June matches was the wind-up of the yearly shoot with the high aggregate scores of February, April and June. The range champion was Sgt. Karl Schaugaard of the S. F. Police Department who piled up a total score for the three matches of 4022. Behind Karl was Bob Chow, the genial gunsmith, with 4010 points and on his heels was Highway Patrol Officer Milt Klipfel with 2991 points. As a matter of fact all 6 open class winners, except Chow, were of the law enforcement order. Cap Jacobs finished 4th, Ken Kolb, fifth and Jack Ahern 6th. Strange to say most all the class winners were law enforcement officers.

I had intended giving you the dope on the three matches but got off on Pop Dutil and plumb ran out of time so all I can do now is give you the scores of the class winners for 1954.

And before I forget I must tell Dave Menary, the new sheriff of Marin County, that all the shooters are very glad that he won the election and hope that his new duties do not interfere with his shooting at Oakland and San Francisco.

POLICE PUBLIC RELATIONS

By VAUL E. ROUZER, Chairman
Public Relations Committee

Police procedure has progressed unbelievably far during the past decade and accordingly the police field has, literally speaking, grown by leaps and bounds. Figuratively, the police profession has come of age. These facts are important not only to police officers and to police departments, but to the public as a whole for they presage a new police service.

To be considered a friend by the public generally would bring harmony into and Mrs. John Q. Citizen because too little publicity is given to the necessity and value of modern-day police work.

Whether your department is large or small, whether it is well accepted or ill regarded, whether you are cognizant of the fact or not, there is a very urgent need today for a positive and hard hitting public relations program in all police departments. Police departments have a new and better service to sell to the public and regulations cause ill will, changes of police policy also have a tendency to breed contempt for police, and certainly the ill-tempered, discourteous police officer contributes his share to barricading the road to fine public relations.

In recent years, the people of communities have realized that an efficient and courteous police department, with trained officers, is definitely one of their greatest assets. I, as well as you, have listened to the many dealings which the police department must have with many persons during the year. Many persons are not particularly favorable to the police simply because they know so little about the big job which only the police can perform and do perform. Many think of police traffic work only as the handing out of tickets for infractions of driving rules and regulations. What police do to prevent casualties and save lives is too little known by Mr.

there is nothing that the public likes quite as well as an assurance that it is secure in its life, property, and well being. There is nothing that can furnish that assurance quite as well as an efficient police operation. A well informed public is always a good cooperating public, and it is essential that police departments inform the people of their communities of their problems and suggest ways and means the public can cooperate. Sudden changes in traffic conversations involving police and have heard people boast of the fine police department back home. Then again, we have heard conversations to the other extreme.

The public is quick to scrutinize the individual police officer and to form an opinion, and many times the first opinion becomes the lasting one.

In the past years, the program of public relations in police departments has

A Training Program for Sex Crime Investigation

By JOHN M. WATAHOVICH, President
Pennsylvania Chiefs of Police Association

Crime statistics in the United States have steadily increased until the last published annual figures of the FBI Uniform Crime Reports show that for the first time in the history of this country over two million major crimes were committed in 1952. And for additional proof that these figures were substantial, I want to refer to those same crime reports which have been listed for the first six months organization, in order to determine where the break-through has occurred and what categories are responsible for these unwelcome increases.

An analysis of the facts and figures clearly indicates that sex offenses have increased 50 per cent in the past 10 years. And even then the true picture of an unwholesome and unpleasant situation is not presented, since it is estimated that only word which many newspapers dislike to print and which courts and police authorities want to handle in a quiet, behind-the-scenes manner. Police departments are reluctant to conduct investigations, ask questions, and make arrests because in so many instances those involved in the sex dereliction are influential, wealthy, or politically powerful individuals. Law enforcement officers in state after state find of 1953 and represent almost a three per cent increase over the first six months of 1952.

When such a situation occurs, people all over the country begin to demand, "What is wrong with the police department?" "Is our law enforcement system breaking down?" Are the police receiving sufficient and adequate training? "What is the reason for these high crime figures?"

And so we in law enforcement turn to the statistics, as does every large business three out of every five rapes are reported to the police and only one out of every twenty sex offenses makes its way to a police blotter.

Police departments throughout the country will readily admit that the sex offender is a difficult and unsolved problem. In many instances they are content to coast with the circumstances, hoping that a little child or a helpless woman will not be badly injured or killed.

For too many years sex has been an ugly themselves running up against courts which are not only unsympathetic, but have very little knowledge and understanding of the various perversions and how they fit into the offense pattern. In other instances, they are loath to proceed in cases where the only witness is a timid inexperienced girl or a guiltless child, feeling that they have very little chance of obtaining a conviction. In these cases, you will find that the police are willing to ac-

TRENDS IN RURAL POLICE PROTECTION

By EDWARD J. HICKEY

During the past forty years we have witnessed a phenomenal growth in state police agencies and highway patrol services throughout the United States. Four decades ago, only four states had state police agencies—Texas, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. In the latter two states the agencies were limited to certain activities in the detection of crime and in suppressing vice and gambling. Contrasted with this limited number, and an strength. The entire pattern of state police administration and operation has been undergoing a decided change consistent with the times and the changing pattern of rural living. The suburban movement has brought a large segment of our population into areas policed by state departments. The convenience of modern travel and improved rural schools and other services have beckoned the urban dweller to migrate into the countryside. Another in rural and suburban areas have brought demands for improved police operations and services. Police administrators, inspired by public demand and by higher professional standards set by leaders in their own field, have responded in large measure by striving for, and in most instances achieving, higher standards of performance through improved administration, supervision, personnel selection and management, and training.

Sheriff Carlos A. Sousa and his reserve deputies. These men augment efficient rural police protection in San Joaquin County.

only slightly larger handful of forces in the New England and Middle Atlantic states a quarter of a century ago, we now see every state in the Union supporting state enforcement agencies of one type or another. The rapid expansion of existing state departments and the organization of new forces clearly indicate the trend of these years in the term of physical growth.

A CHANGING PATTERN

At the same time there has been much more than an increase in numerical factor modifying the pattern of life in rural areas is the planned dispersal of vital defense industries outside of heavily populated centers. Small communities suddenly find themselves reaping a tax bonanza, but with an accompanying host of problems, not the least of which are acute traffic and crime problems, far beyond the scope and resources of their present police operations.

Public realization of and interest in these problems of traffic and crime control

Improved performance has, in turn, brought better working conditions, equipment, salaries, and retirement benefits to most departments. More is expected and more is given. We may well look back with nostalgia to the "good old days" and recall the iron men, those outstanding figures in law enforcement who made the unusual and the heroic look commonplace. These personalities stood out against a background of mediocrity, and achieved

The joint meeting of the Associated Public Communication Officers and the California Public Safety Radio Association was held in Visalia on May 14 and 15, 1954. The meeting host was Mr. Orvil Woods of Tulare County Sheriff's Office in Visalia.

The meeting was called to order by National APCO President Brower McMurphy at 9:40 a.m. with 60 members and guests in attendance. President McMurphy introduced the officers of both associations. He then turned the meeting over to Orvil Woods. Orvil greeted the group, presented the agenda for the conference, and then introduced Mr. Frank Benson, Chief of Police for the City of Visalia.

Chief Benson extended a cordial welcome to the group and acknowledged the excellent work on behalf of Public Safety Communications by CPRA and APCO.

Northern California President Art McDole then took over the Chairmanship and conducted a brief meeting of the Northern Chapter.

The minutes of the April APCO meeting were read and approved.

Membership applications for Harry Chambers, Paul Chitwood and Irving Astmann were referred to the Board of Directors for study and recommendations. A commercial membership application for George W. Kenyon was approved on a motion by LeBoeuf, seconded by Keller.

President McDole then called for committee reports.

Procedure and Operating Committee: Chairman Lewis reported on a preliminary draft of Northern California Point-to-Point procedure and stated that it would be presented at the next APCO meeting.

Frequency and Engineering had no requests for clearances.

The next Northern California meeting was temporarily set for Sacramento on June 10. As there was no further Chapter business the Northern California meeting was closed.

Mr. Hugh Young, Assistant Regional Manager for Motorola, spoke on telephone utility attempts in the public safety field and methods of computing cost comparisons of municipal versus utility operation.

Deputy Chief Hohmann of Los Angeles Police then advised the group on some legal determinations and action taken by the City of Los Angeles before the PUC with respect to telephone company operations.

At this point the meeting was turned over to CPRA President Harvey Platt who welcomed the members on behalf of CPRA. President Platt then called the CPRA Chapter meeting into session.

Fred Crowder reviewed the crystal coordinating problem of re-establishing the Inter-system network in the 150 mc band. The City of Los Angeles was given clearance on the microwave pair 958.5 and 958.9 mc. In connection with the use of 33.10 mc by the Board of Public Works (Highway Maintenance) of the City of Los Angeles, the CPRA went on official record as not objecting to such usage.

Max Elliot reported on the engineering progress on two problems: One involving San Diego and the Los Angeles area, and the other involving the City of Burbank which was satisfactorily solved. Max also told of the existence and availability of microwave manuals originally composed for the Army. Detailed information on these is available from Max. Bud Whiteman predicted 150 mc operation on the Inter-system network by July 1, 1954. Bob Miller, Los Angeles County, announced that the new code books were off the press and were now available to all interested parties. At the close of this meeting, a Joint Resolutions Committee was appointed for the purpose of submitting resolutions to the joint session on the following day.

Our host introduced Mr. James Anand, Chief, Division of Supply, Office of Civil Defense, who spoke briefly on 50-50 matching funds for communications.

The meeting was recessed at 12:15 for lunch.

Following lunch the afternoon session was called to order at 1:20 p.m. as an active member meeting only with CPRA President Platt presiding. CPRA Secretary Keeley read a copy of a letter directed to Walter Williams from CPRA on his statement in the Bulletin in conjunction with National Resolution No. 1. Mr. Williams' taped reply was then played for the group. On a motion by Whiting, which was seconded and approved by CPRA members, the Secretary was directed to advise Williams his reply had been acknowledged and filed.

McMurphy gave the group some enlightening information on the proposed systems licensing by the FCC.

The membership then partook of a general discussion of the FCC questionnaire. Bill Whiting requested the Resolution Committee to draft a resolution stating that the FCC questionnaire request for on the air time does not fit public safety operations and that those agencies are attempting to conserve air time by use of good operating procedures. Such conservation may possibly penalize public safety communications at some future time with respect to systems usage. The Resolutions Committee was so directed.

The respective secretary's reports showed 127 members in CPRA and 95 in APCO.

Whiting distributed to the Procedure Committees some copies of the proposed procedure of the Southern California point-to-point radio system. He requested that an attempt be made to prepare a standardized Northern and Southern California Point-to-Point Procedure.

Rick Keeley presented some additional information on the Miami fire alarm story.

The meeting was recessed at 5:15 p.m. until 9:30 a.m. Friday by CPRA President Harvey Platt.

The meeting was called to order at 9:20 a.m. on Friday, May 15, with CPRA President Harvey Platt presiding.

The meeting was turned over to R. A. Mason of Santa Clara County, who presented the members with copies and spoke on a set of proposed standards for use of radio in the fire service. The present intent of these standards is to prepare a set suitable for adoption by the Board of Fire Underwriters of the Pacific. The ultimate goal would be that those fire departments operating radio in accordance with these standards would be provided with extra credits in the grading of their city. A general discussion followed.

Foster Strong, Chairman of the Resolutions Committee, presented Resolution No. 2, urging that a system of standards for the operation, installation and maintenance of fire radio systems be established. On a motion by Bill Whiting, seconded by Calvert, this was approved, the Resolution to be directed to National APCO, IFC, IMSA, NFPA, American Municipal Association and other western Fire Associations.

RIDE INTO OBLIVION

By W. R. Hecox

Mrs. Olga Subdon, pretty brunette waitress, took the money off the counter and rang it up in the cash register. There was a dollar and a half for her. She looked at the rangy, sandy-haired customer and smiled.

"Nice guy," she remarked to June Penhall, another waitress at the Cozy Corner Cafe in Campbell, California.

"Yes," Miss Penhall answered, "but kind of quiet. And he acted funny."

"What do you mean?" asked Mrs. Subdon.

"I can't put my finger on it exactly," responded Miss Penhall, "except that he seemed nervous, as though he was waiting for something."

Mrs. Subdon watched the sandy-haired man get into the aging Plymouth sedan that was parked outside the restaurant. "I noticed that too," she said. He's probably a veteran just back from tough ac-counter and watched their customer start his car and drive away. He drove west toward the High School.

A few moments later the battered Plymouth pulled up in front of Campbell High School, close to the tennis courts. Exuberant students were pouring from the school's exits and moving toward the football field. The sandy-haired man leaned toward the sidewalk window and called to a passing co-ed. She threw him

BICYCLE COURT

The Sanger Police Department, headed by Carl E. Armstrong, has instituted one of the most unique and interesting programs in California to augment its traffic safety campaign.

For the purpose of safety and education, a bicycle court has been established since 1952. Senior students of the Sanger Union High School serve as judges for the court which has been highly effective in reducing violations and accidents in-spending the entire day at the high school with the senior problems class. A spirit of friendliness exists between the police and students resulting in cooperation and a minimum amount of juvenile trouble. Students call Chief Armstrong and his officers by their first names.

The Sanger department includes twelve regular officers and a trained reserve numbering 30 men. They have received classroom instruction taught by

In addition to the bicycle court the Sanger department takes an active part in school traffic patrols and identification cards are given to all members who qualify as junior police. The cards are presented by the police department.

Chief Armstrong and his officers work closely with all schools, speaking at assembly programs often and sometimes

San Francisco's Strangest Kidnapping

The slim, catlike man paused briefly in the doorway of 100 Broderick and glanced furtively up and down the street. He shivered as icy daggers of winter wind stabbed through his clothing.

"There's a car coming," he muttered to his companion. "We'd better separate. I'll meet you downtown."

The second man nodded, drew back into the shadow and watched his partner cover the distance north on Broderick with long springy strides. He glanced at the steps and swung south on Broderick, walking swiftly toward Haight Street.

Inside the car Officer Larry Driscoll nudged his partner, Ray Bekelund. They had seen the sinister pair some distance back and meant to investigate.

"There goes the second one," Driscoll observed. "What do you suppose they're up to?"

"Let's get the first one," suggested Bekelund. "We'll find out soon enough." He wheeled the car over to the curb,

"I guess not," he answered. "It's just cold, and I've been walking fast to keep warm. I'll catch the devil when I get home though. Lost half a week's wages in a poker game. And caught cold in the bargain." The man grinned nervously. "California draw may be legal here, but it isn't with my wife."

He drew nearer and the officers relaxed. The fellow was probably all right. Just a routine investigation and then maybe they would give him a ride home. He looked his watch. It was three thirty a.m., Friday, January 14, 1944. His gaze was drawn south by the steadily approaching headlights. The car was cruising along at an even rate.

Cruising—the word bit into the man's brain. A moment later his suspicions were verified as he caught sight of the twin antennae and the sign on the car's side: Accident Prevention Bureau, San Francisco Police Department. He trotted down close to the lean man. Their quarry turned, glanced at them, then hurried on. He had the curious furtive quality of a rat, who would fight viciously when cornered, but was more than willing to run. Bekelund eased the car along the curb while Driscoll rolled down the window.

"In a hurry, Bud?" he inquired.

The man paused nervously, and stared blankly at the police car. Then he walked toward them slowly.

innocent enough. All but his eyes. Officer Driscoll caught a glimpse of his eyes and shivered. There was something sinister there. They were rat's eyes, cold and beady and without any trace of emotion. Driscoll shrugged. Working nights did things to a man's imagination.

The man coughed, and reached toward his pocket.

"Easy there," Driscoll warned.

CONFERENCE

Traffic courts and their role in traffic accident prevention will be the subject of a five-day conference to be conducted October 11-15 at the Northwestern University School of Law, 357 East Chicago Avenue, Chicago.

Offered for judges, prosecutors, justices of the peace, and other court personnel, this will be the Eighth Traffic Court Conference to be planned and directed by the American Bar Association's Traffic Court Committee, the Law School and the Traffic Institute of Northwestern University.

"Improved court handling of traffic violators, in an age when traffic courts afford the average citizen his only personal contact with his judicial system, is the aim of the American Bar Association's Traffic Court Program," according to James P. Economos, director of the program.

"Swift, efficient justice in the nation's traffic courts plays an important role in reducing traffic accidents. Conferences of this type are effective in providing judges and prosecutors with the special knowledge and skill so necessary in dealing with the traffic violator problem."

The conference will cover such subjects as: The role of the courts and their relation to the traffic problem, civil and criminal responsibility in traffic accident cases, the traffic officer in court, the function of the prosecutor, administrative problems in traffic courts, the laws of arrest, and corrective and educational penalization.

Also discussed will be the physical laws affecting motor vehicle operation, including the estimation of speed by use of skid-marks, radar and electrical timing, and the legal aspects and rulings involved in scientific detection devices.

Uniform enforcement policies and driver license controls will be considered, as well as the physiological and legal aspects of the drinking driver problem. Tests and demonstrations of the drinking driver will be included, together with charges of drinking while under the influence of intoxicants.

Among those who will participate in the conference as discussion leaders, in addition to Mr. Economos, will be: Dr. C. W. Muehlberger, state toxicologist of Michigan; Robert L. Donigan and Edward C. Fisher, counsel and associate counsel, respectively. The Traffic Institute; George Larsen, Jr., and Paul C. Keller of the Institute's training staff, and Thomas P. Stack, field representative of the Traffic Division of the International Association of Chiefs of Police.

A new basic training manual and a new sound motion picture, both entitled "Traffic Officer in Court," are now available, according to the Traffic Institute, Northwestern University.

The 13-page manual, which covers practical problems confronted by police officers when testifying in traffic cases in court, was written by Edward C. Fisher, associate counsel of the Traffic Institute and former judge of the Municipal Court of Lincoln, Nebraska. It is available from the Traffic Institute, 1704 Judson Ave., Evanston, Ill., at 25c for single copies, with discounts allowed for quantities.

The film, which is based on and supplements the manual, was produced by the National Association of Automotive Mutual Insurance Companies for the Traffic Institute. It is a 10-minute, 16mm sound film. It may be purchased from Vogue Wright Studios, 237 E. Ontario St., Chicago 11, for $32.50. Arrangements can be made for preview of the film before purchase. A copy of the manual, "Traffic Officer in Court," is included, without charge, in every film order.

"The basic theme of the manual and the film on 'Traffic Officer in Court' is that, regardless of surroundings and quality of procedures applied, all courts and court officials have the same serious job to do," said Franklin M. Krenzl, director of the Traffic Institute.

"In light of these requirements, the police officer must deport himself with dignity and competence befitting his important mission. For the officer who testifies in traffic cases, the manual and film are excellent guides for improving his courtroom work in all of its practical aspects."

The film is based on the loss of a case by an officer in court. The judge and the officer's supervisor analyze the reasons why police testimony in court cases is ineffective.

Gerald O'Connell, Institute director of training, had the dual role of technical consultant and actor during the filming of "Traffic Officer in Court." He played the part of the defense attorney.

"Traffic Officer in Court" is the third in a series of films being produced for the Institute by the NAAMIC. The first two are "Signals and Gestures" (used by police in directing traffic) and "Hit-and-Run Investigation." These are available from Vogue Wright Studios in 35mm sound slide and 16mm sound motion pictures. A fourth film, "Detecting and Recording Skidmarks," is now in production.

Preparation and printing of the manual was made possible by funds for development work granted the Traffic Institute by the Liberty Mutual Insurance Company, Boston.

been endorsed by the chief or commanding officer, and officials of the community, who believed it to be their job and their job alone. Each member of a police department, large or small, must be a representative himself for better public relations. Chiefs should stress this point, setting forth the need for better public relations, and insist that all members of their respective departments be aware of the value of public relations, understanding that it is the public which controls the purse strings and can make its demands also for better working conditions and general support of the police profession.

The Pennsylvania Chiefs of Police Association has done an outstanding job in the promotion of better public relations and has had much to do with the general public favor of the police profession in the great state of Pennsylvania. We urge you therefore to continue as you have in the past, by promoting the police profession to an even higher level in the years ahead, so that the police of Pennsylvania can take their rightful place among the other recognized professions of our day.

SIGNS FOR LIFE

"Expert drivers watch for and obey the signs for life.

"These signs of life," explained California Highway Patrol Commissioner B. R. Caldwell, "are the traffic signs, signals and pavement markings which remind all motorists and pedestrians of the law and warn them of potential dangers.

"Highway users are reminded that there are four basic sign shapes in addition to the familiar cross-buck used to indicate highway railroad crossings. The eight sided sign, red with white letters, always means stop. Round signs, either white or yellow, indicate railroad crossings; and diamond-shaped yellow signs all indicate caution for one reason or another. Rectangular signs tell of directions or regulations. All are important, for to ignore one of them could cost a life.

"The fact that some motorists choose to ignore or disobey these signs or signals is a factor in a considerable percentage of all traffic collisions."

Caldwell emphasized his statement by pointing at figures for pedestrian fatalities during 1953.

"There were 785 pedestrians killed in California last year. In practically every instance either the pedestrian himself, or a thoughtless motorist ignored or disobeyed signs or pavement markings. More than 35 per cent of these victims were crossing the street at interesections," he said.

cept a plea to a charge of disorderly conduct or breach of the peace rather than the more definite offenses of sodomy, carnal knowledge, and indecent liberties.

The public is not without blame in permitting this situation to grow unchecked. It is easy to find hundreds of persons in a community who will give you information concerning individuals who are suspected pedophiles, exhibitionists and Peeping Toms, but if you ask one of those persons to sign a complaint or to appear against the suspect, you find that you are suddenly alone. One of the principal reasons advanced by police chiefs throughout the country for their failure to successfully combat the increasing figures of sex delinquency is the noncooperation of the public and the reluctance of their witnesses. Police officers can investigate a case but in the absence of a confession, he needs reliable, cooperative witnesses to appear in court and make the proper identification.

In 1953, the Pennsylvania Chiefs of Police Association considered these problems and decided that one of the best ways to deal with the matter was to bring the offender out into the white light of publicity. Our Educational Committee, headed by Ray J. Abbaticchio, Jr., and Fred J. Hallford, special agents in charge of the Philadelphia and Pittsburgh FBI offices, realized that this course of study was a radical change in police school training, inasmuch as most schools deal with it in a superficial manner and do not go into detailed definition, explanation and investigative procedures.

Walter V. McLaughlin, special agent, Philadelphia FBI Office, was assigned to the research of material and compilation of a 9-hour course. By October 1, 1953, the course of training was ready and FBI instructors began teaching "Sex Crime Investigations" at various schools throughout the state.

Never has the desire of police officers to secure training been demonstrated in a more definite manner than by the fact that during the period of October 1, 1953, to March 31, 1954, over 4,000 officers in the state of Pennsylvania attended 80 schools of this type.

In Philadelphia, Commissioner Thomas J. Gibbons put 1,400 policemen and women through a series of 23 schools and has made the course of instruction a component part of all future recruit training schools.

In Lackawanna County, District Attorney Carlin M. O'Malley sponsored one of the training courses and insisted that his entire staff attend the classes, together with over a hundred other county law enforcement officers.

The purpose of the training was as

Samuel Siegle, director of the Pennsylvania Chiefs of Police Association, said, "not to determine what causes a man to commit these crimes or what should be done to cure him, but rather to teach the police officer to know and detect these offenses, to apprehend the offender and make certain that an adequate case is presented in court."

In view of the enthusiastic reception and the unprecedented number of students attending these courses, arrangements are being made to provide an advanced course in 1954-55 which will deal more closely with interview and the homosexual ramifications attendant upon these types of crimes. The general outline of the instant curriculum was:

1. Definitions and explanation of sex offenses.
2. Investigative techniques.
3. Laboratory techniques.
4. Witness—suspect identification.
5. Laws dealing with sex offenses.
6. Preventive measures.

I feel that the above training program, endorsed by the FBI and the Pennsylvania Chiefs of Police Association, will do much to alert and educate the police officer, and this, in turn, will have as a consequence the curbing of sex offenses.

CAPITAL IDEA

A motorist found it necessary to replace the gas cap on his automobile and inadvertently use a radiator cap instead. Because the radiator cap was not vented, his gasoline tank collapsed shortly afterwards due to the vacuum created in it as the gas was withdrawn, the California State Automobile Association reports. In the event you need to replace the gas cap on your car, be sure you use a cap that is vented.

PEDAL DANCER

Remember the less you need to use your brakes, the better driver you are, says the California State Automobile Association. Don't be a pedal dancer driver.

QUICK BRAKING

Quick, positive braking means locked wheels and locked wheels slide, warns the National Automobile Club. Sudden application of the brakes and consequent sliding of the tires is a costly practice on a dry road, but when the roadway is wet and slippery such practice may end in disaster.

SAFE SPEED

On this coming Fourth of July week end, and at all times, drive at a safe speed, advises the National Automobile Club.

RURAL POLICE PROTECTION

results despite almost insurmountable obstacles, most of which we do not meet today.

Realization of the vital importance, in our government, of law enforcement of a high caliber has brought about a changed attitude on the part of enlightened public officials. In 1939, at the Forty-sixth Annual Conference of the International Association of Chiefs of Police held in San Francisco, California, the Honorable Earl Warren, then Governor of California, stated:

"And in my humble opinion, whether or not democracy is to succeed depends more upon whether or not we have good, honest and efficient local government than any other combination of circumstances or things. And whether or not we are to have good local government depends upon you, depends upon the police departments of this country, because you perform the important functions of local government."

ENLARGED RESOURCES AND IMPROVED SERVICES

No institution stands still; it either progresses or fails to keep pace with changing times. The state police service has not stood still in the dynamic stream of social changes we have witnessed in the past three decades. What is true in Connecticut is true elsewhere. In 1928 the State Police Department in Connecticut, like most of the state forces existing at that time, had a small complement of men housed mostly in rented barracks which were not designed for the use to which they were being put. The men worked extremely long hours, and there was no round-the-clock patrol service such as we now have. Officers were expected to spend many nights at the barracks on stand-by duty in case of emergency. No preventive patrol service was attempted on an organized basis during the night hours. If a complaint was received, an officer was called from his bed and often had to drive many miles to reach the complainant. Barracks were run on an individual basis, with very little policy control from a top administrative level.

Public relations were hardly considered, and the public knew little of the operation of the state police except as their enforcement action reached the public press. Communications with state police on the highway were of the most uncertain type. Training was adequate to meet the demands of the times, and officers entering the department in 1921 attended a training school. But needed equipment other than automobiles and motorcycles was not often available.

Supervision and control of the state police officer is one of the real problems of state-wide policing, and brings many problens to the administrator. State officers do not operate under the watchful eye of a patrol sergeant or a lieutenant as in the city service, where beats and other patrol areas are more or less restricted. There is no system of call boxes in rural areas to check and communicate, with the personnel in the field. Early efforts to use a time-clock system at various points on patrols proved impractical and were quickly abandoned. The solution was found to lie in a close and careful check on the reports of operation submitted by each officer, covering his activities, rather than on attempts to supervise him directly.

Today the time and location of the officer's patrol contacts, his report of services rendered to the public, is supplemented by the use of the radiotelephone. These radio calls report checks of sensitive points in patrol areas and periodic checks by radio during the night hours, coupled with spot checks by patrol supervisors, serving to provide a degree of field supervision not previously possible.

Direct supervision by captains over all major crimes, traffic problems, and unusual emergencies in their respective districts brings top administrative control into the field and serves to unify policies and operations. A system of rotation of field captains further aids this unity of procedures and operations in all areas of the state to achieve the administrative aim of unity of action and state-wide co-ordination.

These changes have resulted in an increase in supervisory personnel which is absolutely necessary because of the very nature and wide extent of individual operations in the state police service. It is at this point that many state administrators have the greatest control problem, and it is the point at which many administrative failures occur. The increase in command personnel opens new avenues of advancement and inspires greater activity on the part of the men eligible for such advancement. Efficient operation to render proper public service requires 24-hour coverage in the field, and since 1938 this has been established in many state police departments.

Sufficient personnel increases to meet this extended service were not immediately available, and manpower had to be utilized to its best advantage. Every good administrator is constantly striving to increase the efficiency of his personnel, and the question is not how many men he has at his service, but rather how good is the available manpower.

In many departments a sound program of public relations has been instituted during the period under review, which has helped to obtain the needed public understanding and legislative support. A police department must first do a good job of policing with the resources at hand, and then must tell the public it serves of the nature and the quality of that job. We must show the citizens what they are getting for their money invested for police service, and convince them that the police have nothing to sell but their services, many of which prove unpopular with a considerable segment of the public. This changing concept of public relations has proved to be one of the most important changes in administrative procedure.

During this same period, great advances have been made in communications. Many state departments have installed teletype-writer systems and improvements in radio-telephone communications. The latter has proved to be a boon to the state police service. The thin web of control over the officer in the field has been strengthened, and the officer on patrol is now as near to his immediate supervisor as to the radio set in his patrol car, thus greatly increasing the efficiency of the service.

DECLINING OPPOSITION OF ORGANIZED LABOR

In the early days of state police, the sponsors of such police services met head on with the opposition of organized labor. In many states organized labor was deeply concerned about the attempt to establish and increase state police services, fearing that such organizations would be used in strikes. Several eastern industrial states were confronted with this opposition, and in some instances special legislation controlled the use of state police in labor strikes.

State highway patrols established in the past three decades have not been confronted with this problem, as their police powers are often limited strictly to the state highways. Many states have passed legislation restricting the use of state police in labor matters, placing the responsibility on the governor of the state by requiring his approval for use of the police at strike scenes. Other states require, especially in municipalities having local organized police forces, a written request and the approval of the chief of police and the executive officer of the municipality in order to call upon the state police for assistance in preserving the peace.

While this opposition by organized labor has been on the decline in the past decade, experienced state police administrators are fully aware of the pressure exerted in many places when state police are sought to maintain law and order at strike scenes. Administrators are also aware of the many changes in state and national laws relative to the use of police powers at such places. The use of too few or too many policemen at a strike scene often determines the attitude of those engaged in labor's opposition to increasing state police personnel.

In Connecticut, a successful policy was established by Governor Raymond E. Baldwin, now Associate Justice of the Connecticut Supreme Court. In 1946 he declared:

"We pursued a policy that I submit all state police departments ought to pursue. In the past it has always been customary for the police to use the facilities of the factory at which a strike was in progress, making their headquarters there, and being fed there. Thus, they might have the appearance of being supporters of the employer when, as a matter of fact, they should be impartial keepers of the peace between the disputant factions. The State Police Commissioner wisely provided all of the facilities needed by the state police, food, and otherwise, outside the gate of the plant."

DECLINE OF THE CONSTABLE AND SHERIFF

The office of constable is the oldest in police history. It comes down from medieval law. At one time the constable was in general the leader of the royal armies and had cognizance in all matters in war and arms, exercising both civil and military jurisdiction. He was a high functionary under the French and English kings, the dignity and importance of whose office were second only to those of the monarch.

In American law, the constable is an officer of a municipal corporation, elected by the people, whose duties are similar to those of the sheriff. Though his powers are the same, his jurisdiction is smaller.

The sheriff likewise comes down through the ages, and is the principal peace officer in every county, being chosen by popular election in nearly all states. His chief duties are in aid of criminal courts and civil courts, and he has original jurisdiction in all criminal matters. Before the era of state police departments in this country, the sheriff was the high enforcement official of criminal laws in each county, while the constable had equal power in the town for which he was elected. The formal authority of both offices still stands, though their participation in law enforcement is steadily declining.

In the development of this country through the years, centers of population have banded together to form cities, which needed more protection than the sheriff of the county or the local constable could provide. City police departments have been given the same powers relating to criminal matters as sheriffs and constables. Citizens look to the police department for the investigation and detection of crime, rather than to the elected official.

Through experience, education, and public relations, the people in rural areas look to the state police for the enforcement of the criminal law.

The development of the motor vehicle era has also brought the need for more police officers, and the enforcement of law has in most places been left to a larger force of men with wider jurisdiction, than those designated to county and town officials.

In Connecticut prior to 1939, the local constable received compensation for his efforts through a fee system. This amounted to a statutory regulation compensating him for each arrest that he made, whether the person arrested was convicted or not. If convicted, the accused paid the costs of the court, in which were computed the constable's fee, and those of the justice of the peace and the prosecuting grand juror. When this law was changed, the constable was still elected to office, but after his election he was appointed by the first selectman of the town to be the special constable and to receive compensation from the town. This amount of compensation was so small that most elected constables did not care for this appointment.

The local constable likewise serves civil process, for which his compensation is regulated by statute. The trend in the past twenty-five years in civil matters is for the writs to be served through the office of the high sheriff. He in turn does out these services to his deputies, as he has jurisdiction in more than one town.

So from a position of highest importance in medieval times, through the evolution of living standards, the constable is now relegated to a position of little service to the community.

The sheriffs have fared better with the general public, in that they are salaried county officials, elected in most places for a two- or four-year term. In the East, through popular demand, the sheriff has gradually relinquished his powers in criminal matters to local organized police departments. However, in some sections the governing bodies of counties still retain the sheriffs, who have organized patrol systems and deputies residing in the many towns within their precincts. These sheriffs are from the old school, and through politics have been able to succeed themselves in office through many years. In the Middle West and the Far West, the sheriff retains much of his popularity of frontier days.

Yet the shifting population of this country, the growth of urban areas, the relocation of various industries throughout the country, all tend to burden the adaptability of the sheriff and the constable to current public needs.

MOUNTED VERSUS MOTOR PATROLS

Mounted units have gradually disappeared from state police forces as services and responsibilities have changed. In many instances they have been casualties of the machine age.

Pennsylvania is among the states which retain a mounted unit, although at present its strength has been reduced to a minimum. This mounted unit has proved its value in that state and is considered good insurance for the maintenance of law and order in riots and for crowd control in large gatherings of people.

State and metropolitan police departments which now maintain mounted units do so in the opinion that a mounted policeman is worth several dismounted men in maintaining order at outdoor gatherings and demonstrations, where exceptionally large or unruly crowds are assembled. Of course, the mounted troopers are used in co-operation with dismounted patrolmen in these operations.

At large outdoor gatherings, as in traffic work, the chief advantages of the mounted police are height and mobility. They are in a position to spot a difficulty at once, make their way to it rapidly, and take the situation quickly in hand. Their work is then supplemented by the foot patrolman. Mounted officers command a respect from a crowd. They have a psychological effect on crowds, since the average person is more or less afraid of being trampled on by the horses' feet.

In addition to these listed purposes, mounted troopers have value in mountainous or open areas in searches for criminals or lost persons, since they are able to reach trails and spots which are not accessible to motor vehicles. Also, their use in ceremonial occasions or parades is impressive.

Other than for the specific uses mentioned, the modern methods and practices of state police departments have been geared to cope with crime and traffic in rural areas and high-speed parkways, and the use of horses is minor or nonexistent.

Routine state police criminal and highway patrol work necessitates the use of high-powered cars provided with radio receivers and transmitters, red flashing lights, sirens, first-aid kits, emergency equipment of various types, and, in some instances, specialized facilities such as identification kits and photographic apparatus. This equipment has the effect of turning the patrol car into a one- or two-man mobile substation capable of ranging far afield from its base station. This patrol car may be used as a field station to carry prisoners, or even may be pressed into service to transport injured persons to the hospital. In this age, the motor patrol has proved its value in all-round police work, whereas mounted troopers are limited to specialized services in a local area.

Even the "iron horse"—the motorcycle—has been retired from active service by many progressive state police forces during the past decade. The motorcycles which formerly were used for patrol service on the highways have been withdrawn from active patrol service in many instances and are now used strictly on assignments such as parades, ceremonies, crowd control, and liaison work. Motorcycles used in such efforts are ordinarily radio-equipped for control purposes. Use of motorcycles at present, however, is ordinarily dependent on clear and dry weather.

The all-purpose jeep, with its four-wheel drive, is fast replacing both the horse and the motorcycle. This vehicle, properly equipped with radio, siren, red flashing light, and trailer hitch, is indeed an all-purpose instrument. Some of the jobs for which it has been utilized in state police work are perimeter crowd control, parade crowd control, searches for lost persons or criminals in terrain unsuitable for patrol cars, and towing rescue boats and emergency equipment to trouble scenes.

Modern inventions, it is apparent, have numbered the days of the state police horse, even though some of the old color and glory of the early troopers must also disappear as a consequence.

CIVIL SERVICE CONTROLS EXPAND

Unlike most other types of public employment, admission to the state police force is not predicated on special qualifications, vocational experience, professional training, or even general education in most instances. Recruits are sought among young men and women of good character and sound physical constitution, who appear to be able to learn what the police force has to teach them, and who it is hoped will prove adaptable to the conditions of police service.

Two decades ago, the majority of state police departments selected their recruits with an eye not only on their qualifications but also on their political affiliations and activity. In a few forces, high standards of selection and promotion were maintained without sharing these essential powers with civil service administrations. Today, the picture has changed; civil service and its occupational counterpart, the merit system, govern recruit selection and promotions in the majority of state police forces.

According to a survey of state enforcement units undertaken in 1950 by the International Association of Chiefs of Police, 25 states had state police units which were invested with general powers in criminal and traffic cases. Of these 25 state police units, 13 operated under their own merit system, 5 were under civil service, and only 7 had neither. Further inquiry revealed that 13 state police organizations based promotions on the results of examinations, while the rest did not.

For any group of police administrators to satisfy the demands of the selection process with full justice to the individuals concerned and with due regard to the overriding interests of the state and its citizens proves exceedingly difficult. Such difficulties are minor, however, when compared with those confronting personnel agencies which seek to deal with questions of police management. In some states the state personnel department regularly turns to the police heads for aid in conducting written and oral examinations and in establishing the standards for service ratings, while in many others this close co-operation still is lacking.

Where personnel departments set up examination procedures independent of the police administrator, neither the police head nor the ranking officers of the force can directly apply any of their own wisdom, police sense, or experience to the primary selection of recruits. An improvement on this system would permit close collaboration between the police commissioner and the personnel department on the scope and contents of written examinations and would authorize the commissioner and state police ranking officers to conduct oral examinations of aspirants for appointment and promotion and to accord ratings on such interviews.

The merit system rule under which the appointing authority is given a choice among the three top names on the eligible list works well enough when only one appointment is involved, but often state police appointments must be made in large numbers when a group is being selected for training or when a policy change makes a large number of promotions necessary. With the system of selecting one applicant from three names and ten applicants from twelve names, the state police head actually enjoys less freedom of selection than do other department heads. It would prove desirable if the two-extra names rule were relaxed for state police appointments, by providing not less than twice as many certifications as there are places to be filled.

Even with various faults, the civil service or merit system fulfills the needs of the police service much more satisfactorily than the system of appointment on a wholly political basis.

TRAINING OF RECRUITS

Every state police department and the vast majority of state and highway patrols today train recruit patrolmen prior to their assignment to duty. There is little difference of opinion among administrators today regarding the need for training of recruit police officers prior to their undertaking active duty in the field. This training is recognized as a necessity without which no recruit can render his best service to the public for whom he labors.

It is plainly understood that some form of training will take place in any police department even if no classroom instruction and practice are made available to the recruit. The costly process of trial-and-error training has given way to formal recruit instruction.

An awakened public demand for more efficient police service has been the motivating force for improvement in training methods in many cases, but in the majority of our more advanced police departments, improvements have come as a result of a desire on the part of the administration of these departments to render better the public service they are sworn to provide.

While there is general agreement among police administrators as to the necessity for recruit training, great difference of opinion arises as to what kind of training and how much of that training should be undertaken. The length of the training period varies from department to department, and the subject matter and methods of presentation also differ. There is no set standard. Each department must be governed by the available material, time, and funds, and must do its best within the means provided.

POLICE CO-OPERATION

Police co-operation shows a tendency to expand, but the future of this co-operation must rest upon the mutual good faith of the agencies concerned. At the beginning of the present century, many of the devices which now aid co-operation, such as radio, teletype, and telephone, were unknown in many police departments and were not seriously considered in others.

PRIVILEGE

Always remember that driving an automobile is a privilege granted by society and not a right bestowed by Providence, reminds the California State Automobile Association. It is a privilege that can be taken away any time you show disrespect for life or property.

POWER BRAKES

Most automobile power-brake systems depend on vacuum supplied by the engine and an electrical vacuum pump for full efficiency. If you are driving an automobile equipped with such power brakes and are unable to start the engine because the battery is run down, it is unwise to have another driver give you a push or to try to start your car by rolling down hill because your car does not have its full braking strength. The California State Automobile Association advises calling a garage serviceman, instead of getting a push, when unable to start a car with power brakes in the normal manner.

Tom Kelly, Chief of Division of Communications, Office of Civil Defense, spoke on Civil Defense problems and on matching funds. So far this year $2,500,000 in Communications Applications for matching funds have been processed.

Fred Crowder requested additional discussion on the reply to Walter Williams. After some discussion he made a motion which was seconded by Simons that CPRA Executive Committee prepare a suitable draft of a letter of reply to be sent to Walter Williams in order to clarify an apparent misunderstanding.

A general discussion followed on the advisability of a semi-annual joint meeting to expedite the inter-change of immediate problems. On a motion by Miller the Presidents of the two organizations were directed to call a business meeting of the Executive Committees and other related committees in the fall of each year. This was approved by the membership, with the suggestion that it be held at the same time as the fall meeting of the League of California Cities.

Foster Strong, Chairman of the Resolutions Committee, presented his report. Resolution No. 1 offering the services of APCO and CPRA to assist in the planning and engineering problems to any public safety agencies desiring them was approved on a motion by Strong, seconded by Calvert.

Resolution No. 3 opposing licensing fees was also approved on a similar motion by Strong.

Resolution No. 4 on the FCC questionnaire was referred to the Executive Committees to revise the resolution slightly and then to take action.

Resolution No. 5 congratulating our host, Mr. Orvil Woods, for a very excellent job in preparing the joint conference was unanimously approved.

Ludy Ludekens of the Southern California Edison Company presented the members with information on the Micro-Wave Users Council.

As there was no further business the annual joint meeting was adjourned at 12:30 p.m.

STATE STANDS HIGH

California has 10.4 per cent of all the automobiles in the United States, and does 10.4 per cent of all the driving, but accounts for only 8.8 per cent of the traffic deaths and only 8.1 per cent of the traffic injuries, according to a recent compilation by the California State Automobile Association.

"Only by adequate enforcement, intelligent traffic supervision, and the full use of all scientific resources can we solve the problem of congestion and reduce the death rate on our streets and highways," said Franklin M. Kreml, director of the Traffic Institute of Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill., in announcing three short courses for police and other traffic specialists to be offered by the Institute late this fall.

The three units are: "Traffic Law for Police," "Traffic Control—Devices and Methods for Police," and "Chemical Tests for Intoxication."

Beginning November 8 and running to December 18, the series is scheduled so that police departments and other agencies may send representatives to two or three units of instruction with no increase in travel costs.

The first course, "Traffic Law for Police," November 8 to 24, is designed for court officers also, and will be concerned with criminal and civil traffic laws, the rules of evidence and the laws of arrest, the selection of charges, case preparation, and the role of the traffic officer in court.

In addition, the course will cover traffic legislation and the organization and operation of traffic courts, as well as the function of violations bureaus and the nature of the civil suit.

It will be taught by Robert L. Donigan, counsel, Edward C. Fisher, associate counsel, and Gerald O'Connell, director of training, all of the Traffic Institute.

The second course, "Traffic Control—Devices and Methods for Police," November 29 to December 10, is designed for police officers who must handle traffic engineering duties, or who wish to learn the best ways and means of traffic control.

This course will cover traffic engineering principles and techniques, uses and types of signs, curb parking and its regulation, accident location analysis, pedestrian control, one-way streets, the operation of point and intersection control, and field surveys.

It will be taught by George W. Barton, traffic engineering consultant, Traffic Institute; Adrian Koert, traffic engineer, Associated Consultants, Evanston, and Mr. O'Connell.

The third course, "Chemical Tests for Intoxication," December 13 to 18, is offered for police, judges, and health and medical laboratory technicians, and will take up the effects of alcohol and the value and legality of chemical tests.

Students will be shown in the laboratory how to conduct blood, breath, and urine tests for determining intoxication, and how to present the results of these tests in court.

L. N. Petersen, Police and Fire Commissioner Ted Barr, and council members Mory Robb, Glen Armstrong and Harold Hickman. The department cooperates with all law enforcement agencies in Chief Armstrong has the full cooperation from them.

A public relations program has been instituted by the department and operated successfully. All member of the department are carefully selected and investigated before hiring.

Crime has been kept to a minimum. Due to the officer's interest and training, most crimes are solved in short order. Officers often work hours overtime in investigation and followup work. The officer's work as a team and morale in the department is high.

Chief Armstrong operates a cattle ranch with the help of his two sons, Buddy, 17, and Phillip, 9. Both boys have cattle and horses and equipment of their own and are old cow hands. Buddy has several registered Angus cattle and has won many prizes and ribbons at fairs. He has champion and Grand Champion ribbons and has won first place in showmanship several times. Phillip plans to follow in his brother's footsteps as soon as he is old enough to enter his stock at the fairs. He has Hereford cattle. Music and leather are the chief's hobbies. At one time he was a saddle maker and still has all his tools. He makes many holsters, belts and so forth for members of the department. Mrs. Armstrong is the former Georgia Yancey of Tollhouse, California.

The chief works and cooperates with civic groups and appears often as a speaker for many organizations. He has been especially active in civil defense organizations.

In 1953, 2,140,000 American were injured in traffic accidents.

There were 50,000 more persons injured in U.S. motor vehicle accidents last year than in 1952.

Speeding on U.S. streets and highways last year killed 13,870 men, women and children.

Three out of four traffic accidents happen in clear weather on dry roads.

Saturday is the most dangerous day of the week in traffic.

"Oh, that's all right." The sandy-haired man looked hurt.

Rita's companion, fifteen-year-old Thora Chamberlain, a pretty, grey-eyed brunette, noticed the injured look. As Rita walked on she lagged behind. The sandy-haired stranger watched her.

"Wait a minute," she said. "How long will it take?"

"Only about a half hour," he told her eagerly. "But if you're going to a football game it will make you late."

"That's all right," she replied, "I can afford to miss the kickoff."

Rita Beiler turned around in time to see Thora reach toward the handle of the car door.

"Coming, Thora?" she called.

"Not right away. I'm going to watch the children." Thora Chamberlain hopped into the car and waved at her friend. "Save me a seat," she called.

Rita watched the car swing around and then turn south on the Santa Clara-Los Gatos road. In a moment it was hidden by the houses and fruit trees that lined the street. She shrugged her shoulders and continued toward the football field.

It was two-thirty p.m. on the afternoon of November second 1945, when Thora Chamberlain stepped into the sandy-haired man's car in front of Campbell High School.

Eight hours later, William J. Emig, sheriff of Santa Clara County, awoke from a deep sleep and sleepily answered his phone. He listened briefly, then reached for apencil.

"Now wait a minute," he interrupted, "let's start from the beginning. What is your name?"

"Frank E. Chamberlain. I'm a contractor and I live at 1071 Pine Avenue, San Jose." In spite of his apparent anxiety, Emig noted that Chamberlain seemed to have his wits about him.

"You say your daughter is missing?" the sheriff interjected. "Can you describe her?"

Chamberlain described his daughter and what she was wearing in detail, while the sheriff made careful notes. When he was through Emig glanced at his watch.

"It's not midnight yet. Couldn't she have gone to a late show?" he asked.

"I don't think so. She hasn't been seen since she left school this afternoon, and she always kept in touch with us. Please try to find her." The voice on the other end of the wire was tense with emotion. Emig promised to give all the help he could, and replaced the receiver on its hook. He glanced at his notes briefly, Describe the following girl: Thora Chamberlain, age 15, five feet three inches tall, 120 pounds, has blue eyes, dark brown, wavy hair, and freckled. Was last seen in front of Campbell High School at 2:30 p.m. today. She is wearing a red skirt, white blouse, blue sweater, red and blue bobby socks, and brown shoes. Give this information to the San Jose police and the highway patrol also, Phil. Good night." Emig replaced the phone on its stand, forgot the incident for the moment, and went back to sleep.

The radio calls that were broadcast immediately availed nothing. A check at the Chamberlain home early the next morning revealed that the girl had not come home during the night. By that time her parents, frantic with worry, were convinced that their daughter had either been involved in a serious accident or been the victim of foul play. Emig called Deputy Sheriff Phil Cuffaro to his office.

"I don't know what this is all about, Phil," Emig admitted, "but the girl that was missing last night hasn't turned up. I want you to find her, if she can be found. It may be that she is just another runaway, although considering her background, it doesn't seem likely. On the other hand there may be something more serious involved. An accident, or kidnapping. Maybe murder."

"Who saw her last?" asked Cuffaro.

"I don't know," Emig answered. "Her father wasn't sure. He only knows that she has been missing ever since yesterday afternoon."

"I'll talk to the family and check up on the runaway angle first," Cuffaro announced. "Then I'll go out to the High School."

At 1071 Pine Avenue, San Jose, Cuffaro found Frank E. Chamberlain, wealthy San Jose building contractor, and his wife impatiently awaiting his arrival. Deep lines of worry that had worn into Chamberlain's face and Mrs. Chamberlain's reddened, tear stained eyes, told a silent story of the sleepless night that preceded his arrival.

"Thora wouldn't have any reason to run away," Mrs. Chamberlain replied to Cuffaro's initial question. "You can see she has more than the average teen age girl and, what's more, she knows she has."

"Could there have been a young man?" Cuffaro queried. "Girls that age do get ideas about wedding bells sometimes. Is it possible that she could have decided to run off and get married? Go to Nevada, for instance, and tell a fib about her age?"

"I don't believe so," returned the missing girl's mother. "Thora is too practical for that. She likes to dance and we let her have dates for school dances and movies. But she is too practical a girl to get any ideas about running off with a high school boy."

"It was just a possibility," murmured Cuffaro, "we have to look into every angle of these cases, you know. Could she have stayed overnight with a friend?"

"She would have notified us and asked our permission," answered Chamberlain. "Thora is too considerate for anything like that. And as far as the boy angle is concerned, she doesn't have any regular boy friend. She has the same interest any normal young lady does in the opposite sex. But she is a long way from boy crazy."

Satisfied that he could get no more information from the girl's parents, Cuffaro proceeded to Campbell High School. There he interviewed J. J. McQuestion, Thora's science teacher.

"She would not have run away," McQuestion told him. "Thora is a fine girl. She is always in good spirits, bright, and well mannered. The type of girl who you would expect to come from a better than average home. She didn't have anything to run away from."

"Have you any idea who saw her last?"

"You might try Rita Beiler," Harold Cramer, the missing girl's mathematics teacher suggested. "I saw Thora leave the building with her about two-thirty yesterday."

Cuffaro found Rita Beiler on the tennis courts. She told of the two girls meeting with the sandy-haired man.

"I thought she was coming to the game," said Miss Beiler. "I saved her a seat during the first quarter, then I gave up. The last thing she did was call to me to save her a seat."

"Do you remember what the man looked like?"

"Very clearly. He was sitting down, but he seemed like a big man. He had a lot of sandy hair and a long nose and he wore a small mustache. I think he must be a veteran."

"What made you think so?" Cuffaro was busy, pencil in hand, recording the school girl's testimony in a note book.

"He was wearing a Navy officer's hat without any insignia."

"What else was he wearing?" queried the deputy.

Rita frowned. "A T-shirt. That's all I could see."

"Can you describe the car?" Cuffaro wanted to know.

"It was an old one. A sedan I believe. But I couldn't tell you what model," Rita replied.

Through Rita, Cuffaro located a second witness, Shirley Courtney, who told of the sandy-haired stranger hailing her.

"I gave him a dirty look and walked on," she told the deputy. "I thought he was in the Navy because of his hat. When I looked around Thora and Rita was talking to him. Then Rita walked on and Thora got into the car."

Five more young ladies, all students at the High School, told of seeing Thora enter the automobile.

"I turned to ask her if she was going to the football game and I saw her getting into the car," fifteen-year-old Euoline Hall testified. "I figured she wasn't going to the game so I went on without her. The car passed me and I saw Thora in the front seat."

Each of the girls described the driver of the car as appearing large, with a long nose, small moustache, and sandy hair. They all remembered the service cap and T-shirt. From Ellen Pearson, the last witness to appear, Cuffaro gained additional information.

"I couldn't miss the car," she told the deputy. "It is exactly like my grandfather's. I remember wondering if my grandfather was around when I saw it parked there."

"Are you sure about the driver's appearance," Cuffaro wanted to know.

Miss Pearson smiled. "Of course I'm sure. Every girl notices what the fellow one of her friends is with looks like."

Unable to get any further information at the High School, Cuffaro checked with Miss Pearson's grandfather and discovered that he owned a 1933 model blue Plymouth four-door sedan. Having secured this data the deputy returned to the sheriff's office to report to his chief. Briefly Cuffaro told the sheriff what he had discovered. Emig frowned.

"It looks bad. Offhand I'd say she was lured into the man's car under false pretenses and then kidnapped after she was unable to escape from the moving vehicle," he observed. "Anyway, you did a good job. I'm going to get the description of the man and the car, as well as the girl, on the three state teletype. Meanwhile it might be a good idea for you to check on local owners of 1933 Plymouth sedans. I know it seems like a hopeless job, but it's the only lead we've got. Try to locate the ones in the Campbell area."

"I don't think it was a local man, chiet," the deputy commented. "If that man had been from a town as small as Campbell one of those girls would have been sure to know him. The Chamberlain girl went there because it was a small school with a congenial atmosphere. Everybody knows everybody else."

"You're probably right," Emig observed. "However, we have to start somewhere and we might as well work in a widening circle."

The sheriff was talking on the telephone when his deputy arrived the next morning. He motioned the deputy to stand by, indicating that the case was important. In a moment he cradled the instrument in its receiver and wheeled around to face his subordinate.

"That was Tom Best, the constable outin Saratoga," Emig announced. "He's got some information I think you had better check up on. Mrs. Ella Beaudoux, the wife of Dr. Henry Beaudoux, says she saw a girl signalling for help on the Los Gatos highway yesterday."

In Saratoga Cuffaro found Mrs. Beaudoux, a kindly, grayhaired woman, known throughout the county as a talented musician and composer. She told the deputy that, after seeing her photograph in the newspaper, she was positive the girl she had seen was Thora Chamberlain. Her description of the auto, an old model of dark blue color, corresponding identically with the 1933 Plymouth he was searching for.

"It was only an accident I saw it," she told him. "Usually I walk down the highway for my mail a little after twelve o'clock. Yesterday I didn't go out until a little after three p.m."

"As I crossed the highway to the mailbox I saw this automobile traveling down the highway at a great rate of speed. I stepped back off the highway to let it pass, and because it was moving so fast, I looked after it."

"The sun was just in the right position so that I could see a young girl at the back window with a terrified expression on her face, clawing at the window as though she was trying to get out."

"Why didn't you notify us sooner?" the deputy wanted to know.

A smile crossed Mrs. Beaudoux's kindly face, then a frown. "I wish I had," she remarked. "I did as soon as I read the papers and realized what I had seen. But at first I thought it was probably just a family fight. A person doesn't expect to witness kidnappings, you know."

Cuffaro returned to the sheriff's office with this new information. His chief's face flushed red and he pounded the desk angrily when he heard the story.

"That does it. The girl was kidnapped and, unless she had all the luck in the world, she probably has been murdered by now." After the first outburst, the sheriff relaxed a little and leaned back in his chair. "You know," he remarked, this case is an awful lot like the Brooke Hart kidnapping. I only hope she doesn't come to the same end he did."

The sheriff was referring to the case twelve years before, when the popular son of San Jose's wealthiest merchant stepped into his roadster in a downtown parking lot and was spirited away to his death and a watery grave in the San Francisco Bay. Emig had arrested the youth's kidnappers six days later, but was forced to watch helplessly while an angry mob stormed his jail, took possession of his prisoners, and lynched them in St. James Park, across from the county courthouse. His only answer in the name of law and order had been to have the tree on which the pair were hung, cut down and removed from the park.

"I hope this case doesn't have the same aftermath," the sheriff remarked.

"This one is different in one respect," Cuffaro corrected. "No one has asked for ransom yet."

"I wish they would," Emig commented. "If they did we might get a lead that would help us crack this case. Right now all we're following are blind alleys that end against blank walls."

For two days Cuffaro and other members of Emig's staff worked tirelessly, tracking down every segment of a clue. The owners of scores of 1933 Plymouth sedans were checked, but none tallied with the description of the supposed kidnapper. On the sixth of November, while Cuffaro was telephoning his office for further information, he received a surprise.

"Go to the Chamberlain home and wait for a phone call," Emig ordered him.

"What's up?" the deputy wanted to know.

"Mrs Chamberlain just had a mysterious telephone call from Long Beach," the sheriff informed him. "Whoever it was hung up, but I believe it may be the girl calling for assistance. There's a chance she might call again. I'm going to have a call traced and contact the Long Beach police. Meanwhile you get over to the Chamberlain home and wait for that call."

Minutes merged into hours while Cuffaro and the Chamberlains stood by the telephone waiting for a second long distance call. But as daylight hours passed into darkness it became increasingly apparent that they were standing a hopeless vigil. A check on the earlier call revealed that it came from a booth in a drug store and Long Beach police informed Emig that they had not had a report on anyone answering the missing girl's description. Cuffaro was finally called away.

"I hate to admit it," Emig confessed, "but it looks as though that call was the work of a crank. There are always a lot of them in these cases."

Two days passed and no new clues turned up. In a final desperate gesture, the Chamberlains announced through the press and radio that they would pay the kidnapper any amount he desired for the return of their daughter. At the same time, on the presumption that the kidnapper might have passed over the Arizona, Nevada, or Oregon border, Emig called in the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

"I hope they can get somewhere," he observed. "I'll have to admit that I am stumped."

However, while the Federal men and sheriff's officers traced innumerable hopeless leads, help was coming from an unexpected quarter.

Thirty miles away in San Mateo, chief of police Robert O'Brien sat at his desk studying the picture of Thora Chamberlain that appeared on the circular Emig had mailed to neighboring police departments. He turned from the circular to the description of the kidnapper and his automobile. Zachary Whitten, a broad-shouldered motorcycle patrolman, noticed his deep study.

"How would you like to crack that one, chief?" he asked.

The chief of police glanced back at the photograph of the girl, then off into space. He spoke like a man who was still half lost in his thoughts.

"I'd like to." He pointed to the picture on the circular. "Particularly if it would save that girl's life I'd like to."

The patrolman grinned and went on about his duties, leaving the chief still studying the circular and the teletype alternately. He had been puzzling over them for several days already. Finally a light of recognition broke across his face. He picked up the telephone.

"Get me John Cost," he ordered the operator. In a moment he was talking to the San Mateo County resident agent of the FBI.

"John, have you been following the Thora Chamberlain case at all?" he asked.

"Not too closely," the agent replied. "The Bureau was only called into the case three days ago and it doesn't seem to have much to do with me. But I could use a good lead if you've got one."

a few minutes?" O'Brien requested. "I think I've got a suspect."

"I'll be right over," the agent responded.

Less than five minutes later the resident agent appeared in O'Brien's office. He glanced around the room and then looked at the chief.

"Where is he?" Cost wanted to know.

O'Brien smiled. "I haven't got him under arrest. But I know where we can get him if we want him. But first I think we'd better talk it over."

"There's no harm in talking," Cost replied skeptically. "Where did you get your lead and who is the suspect?"

O'Brien leaned forward across his desk. "I haven't got any lead except for the man's description." He paused nervously, then went on. "There's a man by the name of Thomas H. McMonigle living at 24 West Poplar Street here who fits the description of the driver of that kidnap car perfectly."

Cost smiled. "I don't doubt there are a lot of men who do. But what makes you think this one did it simply because he look like the kidnapper?"

"Let me tell you about McMonigle," O'Brien suggested. "He came here in the spring of 1943, just after being released from Menard Prison in Illinois. He found employment here as a truck driver, laborer, armored car guard, and hospital attendant. On February the second, 1945, he was arrested by my department on charges of disturbing the peace and battery. He entered a plea of guilty in the municipal court and was sentenced to three months for disturbing the peace and six months for battery. However, both sentences were suspended."

"The sentences were suspended so that McMonigle could support his wife, Ena, the widowed mother of two children whom he married soon after he arrived in town."

"On May 14, 1945, McMonigle offered to give a girl a ride to San Mateo. However, instead of going to San Mateo, he turned off on the Millbrae Road and attempted to rape the girl."

"Her screams brought John Fickeinsen, a farmer who was working nearby, to the scene and he rescued the girl and subdued McMonigle, eventually turning him over to the sheriff."

"Fickeinsen was willing to appear in court and testify against McMonigle, but the girl's parents, pleading personal embarrassment on the part of the girl, refused to prosecute."

"Then, the same court, in an attempt to throttle McMonigle, ordered his suspended sentences for battery and disturbing the peace executed consecutively. That was on May 24. Nine days later McMonigle was freed by a writ of habeas corpus which charged the court which executed the sentences had no jurisdiction over the earlier cases.

"McMonigle was free and the San Mateo municipal court could do nothing because, when the girl refused to prosecute, there was no evidence of his committing any further crimes—in spite of the fact that we all knew he had attacked the girl with felonious intent."

"I have," O'Brien informed him. "At least enough to warrant investigation. McMonigle is six feet tall, weighs two hundred pounds, has bushy, sandy-red hair, a large, prominent nose, and sometimes wears a moustache. Not only that, but his wife's car is a 1933 Plymouth blue four-door sedan."

Cost sat up abruptly and reached for his hat. "Let's go out to Poplar Street and talk to that man."

O'Brien smiled, picked up his own hat, and followed the resident agent out the door. At 24 West Poplar Street they found that Mrs. McMonigle had just returned from the hospital, where she had given birth to her third child, the first by her present husband, October 31. She told the officers that her husband had left three days before their visit, presumably to go to Los Angeles.

"He told me he had to go down there to meet his boss," she informed them. "I didn't like having him go just now and I told him so. I'm afraid I was cross with him because he didn't come to see me at the hospital until I was almost ready to leave."

"Where does your husband work, Mrs. McMonigle?" O'Brien asked her.

"At the Blair Construction Company in Burlingame," she replied. "He's been there for several months now."

After informing her that this was a routine investigation and nothing to worry about, the pair proceeded to the Blair Construction Company.

"If it turns out that he wasn't at work November second, or that he worked a night shift, he'll warrant additional investigation," Cost told O'Brien as they approached the company's gates. They entered the plant and found Ben S. Blair, owner of the firm. He informed them that McMonigle had not been to work for five days from October 28 to November 3.

"He told me he was in San Francisco taking treatment for a venereal disease," he declared. "I don't know where he went this last time, but it certainly wasn't to Los Angeles to meet me."

Convinced by this information that McMonigle was a likely suspect, the pair returned to O'Brien's office. The man's past record, added to the fact that he had been absent from work and had not visited his wife in the hospital, all indicated that he should at least explain his behavior during that period. Cost called the Federal agents in charge of the case in San Jose and gave them what information he had.

A check on McMonigle's prison record at Menard, Illinois, revealed that he had served eight years and three months of a one to fourteen year prison sentence there after being arrested in December, 1934, on a charge of assault with intent to commit rape. Even the tough Federal men gasped when they learned that the woman who had been attacked in Illinois was seventy years old at the time.

Further investigation showed that he had two previous arrests for vagrancy in Edwardsville and Alton, Illinois. The record also revealed that he had a father and sister living in Cottage Hills, Illinois.

A query was forwarded immediately to FBI agents in the Cottage Hills area and they reported, after investigation, that McMonigle's father still lived there. At this point E. J. Connelly, FBI kidnapping expert, arrived in San Jose to take charge of the manhunt. Presented with the case against McMonigle, he promptly issued an order to Illinois, directing Federal men there to keep the boyhood home of the ex-convict under constant surveillance in case further evidence was turned up against him and he appeared there. Meanwhile, Connelly, his agents, and deputy sheriff Cuffaro went to the Campbell High School armed with pictures of McMonigle. Confronted with the photographs the witnesses gave startling evidence.

"It's a bad picture," Euoline Hall told them, "but I think he is the man who was driving the car."

Rita Beiler was more positive. "That's the man," she told them. "I'm sure of it."

Ellen Pearson was equally positive. "That's the man. I would know him anywhere. Except, he had a moustache when he picked up Thora."

Other witnesses also recognized the photograph in varying degrees. Connelly and his agents were jubilant. "I think he's our man," Connelly confided, while they returned to their headquarters in San Jose, "but we've got to find more evidence. Tomorrow we are going up to San Mateo and have a look at his car."

Although she was visibly disturbed by the appearance of Federal men the following day, Mrs. McMonigle showed no reluctance about letting them see the car.

"I haven't used it since I went to the hospital," she said, "although I suppose Tom has. He didn't take it on his trip because it's too old to travel so far in safely." She lead them to the automobile, opened the front door, then stepped back and uttered a little cry of astonishment. She pointed at the front seat. "The upholstery. Somebody's torn it to ribbons."

George Bush, one of Connelly's men, pushed past her. He looked at the ruined front seat and whistled. "Look at this, chief," he urged, stepping to one side so Connelly could see the destruction. He opened the back door but found nothing unusual there, glanced up, then stepped into the car and examined a point on the window post between the front and back seats. He called to Mrs. McMonigle.

"Did you sew this," he queried, indicating a spot on the window post, where the upholstery had been stitched across the wood.

She shook her head. No, I don't even remember seeing it there. I just can't understand what's happened."

"Do you mind if I cut the stitching?" Busch asked her. I don't think it's a very good job anyway, and I want to see what's under it."

"Go right ahead," she instructed him. "It couldn't make much difference now."

Busch produced a small pocket knife from his vest pocket and quickly removed the stitches from the upholstery. While Connelly looked on he spread the fabric apart. A deep gouge mark, apparently made with a small knife, was revealed. The mark was about an inch in diameter and almost as deep. The two deputies thanked Mrs. McMonigle for her cooperation and left.

"I'd like to know what was under that mark," Connelly observed. "Did you notice that it would have been just about level with the head of a five foot three inch woman? I'm afraid that a bullet was taken out of there."

"It probably was a bullet," Busch agreed. "If it was, Thora is probably dead and McMonigle her murderer. I hope the boys get a line on him soon. But we need more evidence."

"We do," Connelly admitted, "but if we get McMonigle we'll get it. And I'm willing to bet that he'll show up in Illinois soon. Meanwhile, let's have another look around the Blair Construction Company. He may have talked during those five days before he left town."

On the return trip to the construction company they found several employees who had talked with McMonigle after his five-day absence. Although he had not told any of them how he spent the time, one of them, Arnold Burch, was able to provide the investigators with interesting information.

with a fifteen year old girl while he was away," Burch told them. "I remember telling him to take it easy—that he was playing with fire."

A new light gleamed in Connelly's eyes. "When did McMonigle tell you about this date with the fifteen year old girl?" he wanted to know.

"The day after he returned to work," Burch replied. "I remember him telling me that he had been out with her the night before."

The construction worker's observation convinced Connelly and Burch that O'Brien's deduction had been a good one. Days passed, however, and the investigation bogged down. McMonigle did not appear in Cottage Hills and Federal agents watching transportation centers throughout the country were unable to locate the ex-convict. Then, on November 26, Duane L. Traynor, a special agent stationed in Springfield, informed Connelly that he had located McMonigle.

Traynor said he spotted the ex-convict when he boarded a train for Springfield at Alton, Illinois. At Springfield the FBI agent trailed McMonigle until he hailed a cab and headed for Quincy. Ten miles from Quincy he lost track of the suspect when McMonigle left the cab and started hitchhiking. Luck was with him, however, and he was able to pick up the trail at Quincy and from that moment on McMonigle was under constant surveillance.

While the agents on the West Coast sought further clues that would serve to convict him of kidnapping Thora Chamberlain, Traynor and his assistants trailing McMonigle had their hands full. After a brief visit at his father's home in Cottage Hills, the ex-convict left and hitchhiked to St. Louis, Missouri, where he purchased two tickets to Mexico.

The agents were prepared to detain him when he boarded the train, but McMonigle changed his mind, turned in his tickets, and hitchhiked back to Illinois. There, they observed him sitting in bars in Quincy and Alton, drinking beer. Although they had learned that the rangy ex-convict was usually verbose, they noted that he was not talking much to anybody during his visit to Illinois. He sat quietly at the bars, drinking beer slowly, as though he was in deep thought.

Finally the suspect left the Park Hotel in Quincy and started hitchhiking toward the Pacific Coast. Federal agents traveled at his elbow all the way. Still hoping he would confide in somebody, they refrained from arresting him.

While stopping in Cheyenne, Wyoming, McMonigle stole a box of what turned out to be sleeping tablets from his landlady. The day he took them he and a companion started hitchhiking toward Reno, Nevada. McMonigle was ignorant of the fact that his companion was a Federal agent, and equally ignorant of the fact that it was more than coincidence that brought two men in a new car along to transport him to Reno.

At Reno the ex-convict and his hitchhiking companion started thumbing their way toward Sacramento. It was at this point the agent reported that McMonigle got a headache and took one of the pills he had stolen.

"The things worked in a vicious circle," the agent observed. "Every time McMonigle would take another pill he would feel worse, and the worse he felt, the more pills he took. He was a living example of how some people happen to take too many sleeping tablets."

At Sacramento McMonigle was out on his feet, but agreed to ride on to San Francisco in a bus.

"I'm too sick to hitchhike," he told the agent, "but I'll be all right on the bus." When the agent boarded the bus, however, it left Sacramento without McMonigle. He waited with Connelly in San Francisco to see if the ex-convict would show up on the next trip. The bus pulled in with McMonigle aboard in a semi-conscious condition.

"We had better arrest him," Connelly observed. "He isn't going to talk without some urging."

Scarcely aware of what was happening to him, McMonigle was taken to the FBI detention cells in San Francisco. The ex-convict was in a comatose condition.

"He's not going to answer any questions in that shape," Connelly commented. "We'd better call a doctor."

Dr. Edward Dana Butler, prominent San Francisco physician, was called to the scene. He lifted the sleeping man's eyelids, then turned to the investigators.

"This man belongs in a hospital. If you ever want to talk to him again, I would suggest that you get him to one as soon as possible," the doctor told them.

McMonigle was removed to the San Francisco hospital and Federal agents were forced to hold up their questioning for two days while he was nursed back to health. On December 8, 1945, they were able to resume their investigation.

At first the ex-convict steadfastly denied that he had ever been close to Campbell. Then, confronted with evidence the agents had already collected, McMonigle suggested that the Federal men take him to Campbell and see for themselves.

"If I see a place I recognize, I'll tell you," McMonigle promised.

Without further delay McMonigle was loaded into an automobile with Connelly and several agents and taken to the scene of the crime. He denied ever seeing the High School before, but while the agents drove slowly through town he pointed suddenly to the Cozy Corner Cafe.

"That place is familiar," he admitted. "I think I had some beer there once."

Connelly followed the car to a stop in front of the cafe and entered with McMonigle. A waitress smiled at the sandy-haired suspect.

"Do you know this man?" Connelly asked her.

"Not exactly," she replied. "He had something to eat here about a month ago and I waited on him. He left a dollar and a half tip."

Connelly took McMonigle back to the car and left him in the care of the other agents while he returned to the cafe. He showed his credentials to the startled waitress.

"There's nothing to be afraid of," he informed her. "I just wanted to know what day he came in here, what time he was here, and when he left."

The waitress frowned and hesitated. "Let me think back and I'll tell you. I know it was a Friday, because there was a football game at the High School. It was November second. He left just before game time."

"How did he act?"

"He acted all right. Quiet, and sort of nervous, but that was all. I remember he ordered soup and pork chops and coffee," she said. "He was very nervous. While he was waiting for his order he went over and played the juke box and pin ball machine."

"He was very friendly and seemed to want to keep me near him, but he acted like a gentleman and didn't make a pass at me."

"Did he leave as soon as he finished his pork chops?" Connelly wanted to know. "Or did he hang around for a while."

"He stayed and drank some beer. He drank four bottles of beer and then ordered a hamburger. He seemed to be waiting for something. He hardly said anything. I can only remember four words—'punchboard,' 'restroom,' 'beer,' and pinball."

"Was there anything unusual about the way he was dressed?" Connelly wanted to know. "Were there any distinguishing marks?"

"Yes. He had the word 'Londonderry' printed across his T-shirt," the waitress answered. "And June here noticed the tattoo mark on his left arm."

"Connelly smiled. "That's fine. And what did you say your name was?"

The waitress told him she was Mrs. Olga Subdon and that she lived in Campbell. Then June Penhall and another waitress, Viola Walden, both corroborated Mrs. Subdon's statement. Peter Spragia, owner of the cafe, and his wife Louise, also recognized the ex-convict.

"We thought he was a returned veteran," they told Connelly. "He looked unhappy and nervous and we were sorry for him."

Confronted with the fact that he had been identified by five people in Campbell, McMonigle confessed. He told the Federal agents that he picked up Thora at the school by asking her the direction to Santa Cruz and that she got in the car to show him the way.

"We got lost," he told the agents. "After a while we reached Santa Cruz and I went to a bar and left the girl in the car. Then I walked with her along the boardwalk at the beach.

"After a while," he continued, "we got into the car and drove to the end of the beach. I parked the car on the right-hand side of the road, left the girl in it, then crossed the road and got her some milk and a hot sandwich at Olivier's restaurant."

McMonigle said he then drove up the lonely coast road that connects Santa Cruz with San Francisco. He said he stopped the car again in Davenport.

"I bought some whiskey there and drank some," he continued, "then I got back into the car and drove on a while. I parked the car by a tool shed near the highway. I saw a little animal hopping along on its back feet, so I got out a 32-caliber colt automatic and tried to shoot it."

The ex-convict said that when he returned to the car he drove to a point facing the ocean. "The gun was lying between us on the front seat," he went on. "All of a sudden it went off in the car. If I shot her that is where it happened.

"I sat there trying to make up my mind what to do. I don't know how much time passed, but after a while I drove away. The girl was dead."

McMonigle said that he then drove on into Santa Mateo County and disposed of the girl's body at a point just south of the treacherous Devil's Slide area. For some reason he could not explain, he said he had taken off his trousers and shirt and lost the trousers. After that he returned home.

Still not satisfied because of several glaring discrepancies in McMonigle's confession, Connelly ordered that the Devil's Slide area be searched for the girl's body.

"We must find the body," he pointed out, "not only to put the girl's family at rest, but to establish a concrete murder case against McMonigle."

Special Agent Richard Carter was lowered from the cliff known as Saddle Rock, a few hundred yards below Devil's Slide. Investigators, staring down the edge of the cliff, held little hope of finding the body. Three hundred and fifty-five feet below them on a vertical drop, the ocean pounded angrily against the face of the cliff. Oldtime residents of the area informed them that the water was at least ten feet deep, even at low tide, at the base of the precipice.

Dangling precariously from lines lowered from the highway, Carter searched the face of the cliff for evidence of Thora's body. The search seemed endless. Finally he signaled his helpers to raise him to the road. He was carrying a small bundle.

Back in San Francisco, he dropped the bundle on Connelly's desk. The chief investigator looked at the bundle, then glanced significantly at Carter. "I guess now we know what happened to Thora," he remarked sadly.

The bundle contained a piece of bright red cloth and two pairs of bobby socks, a blue sock in a red one, and vice versa.

"Of course," Connelly observed, "these might not be Thora's socks. But it seems obvious that they are. Her mother said that she wore the two pairs because they represented the school colors. She was wearing the red skirt and blue sweater for the same reason."

In the face of the new evidence and McMonigle's confession, Connelly turned his prisoner over to Sheriff Emig of Santa Clara County on December 15. Emig promptly took him to the State Penitentiary at San Quentin.

"The residents of Santa Clara County are aroused over this case," he pointed out. "I'm not going to take a chance on a repetition of what happened twelve years ago during the Brooke Hart kidnapping."

McMonigle was turned over to Warden Clinton Duffy of San Quentin for safekeeping and Duffy promptly placed his new prisoner in the death house. Meanwhile McMonigle, secure for the moment, promptly recanted on the confession.

"It was forced," he complained. "They doped me and then got it from me. I never even heard of Thora Chamberlain until they got their hands on me."

"All right," Connelly replied, we'll get more proof. Let's have another look around the Blair Construction Company, and in McMonigle's home. Maybe we can find something there."

After a thorough search of the house at 24 West Poplar Street the investigators found the T-shirt marked Londonderry. Closer inspection revealed the name S. L. Dahlstrom stenciled inside the clothes. A footlocker bearing that name was also discovered.

Special Agent Carter located Dahlstrom, a Navy steward, in San Francisco. The sailor identified the clothing and footlocker at once.

"Sure they're mine," he told Carter. "I had that Londonderry stamp put on them when I was stationed over there. The footlocker was stolen from my car last September. I never expected to see it again."

Meanwhile Special Agent Fred Ell-edge pressed his investigation at the construction company. Again Arnold Burch produced vital information. Burch told Elledge that on November 6, despite a rainstorm which drove all the other men indoors, McMonigle worked for a long time filling in a ditch in the company yard.

"I asked him what the idea was and he told me he was building a ramp so that incoming trucks could enter by a shortcut," Burch remarked. "I thought it was a funny time to decide to do it."

Elledge dug into McMonigle's "ramp" and after some hours discovered a pair of trousers buried between two blocks of concrete. He presented these to Connelly who investigated and found that they belonged to the suspect.

McMonigle's confession placed the murder in Santa Cruz County, local jurisdiction in the case was turned over to District Attorney Stephen Wyckoff and Sheriff J. R. Devitt of Santa Cruz County. At a special meeting of the Santa Cruz County grand jury, an indictment for murder was returned at the same time by the Santa Clara County grand jury.

Connelly, accompanied by Devitt and Wyckoff, took McMonigle from his cell in San Quentin and placed him in the Santa Cruz County Jail. Faced with the new evidence McMonigle confessed a second time, this time stating that he had buried the body in the San Mateo city dump. Connelly, Devitt, with Special Agents Michael Farrin and George Busch, accompanied the ex-convict to San Mateo, where he pointed out the supposed hiding place.

After digging one foot, the quartet discovered a pile of school books belonging to Thora Chamberlain. A foot deeper they found the girl's binder and a blanket with the name C. Izzard—the maiden name of Mrs. McMonigle—stenciled on it. Convinced that they were about to find the body, the quartet dug feverishly for hours, before finally giving up, discouraged and exhausted.

Following another tip from McMonigle, Fred Elledge found the missing upholstery from Mrs. McMonigle's car in a cardboard box under a tree twelve miles west of Bayshore Boulevard on the Millbrae Road, exactly where the ex-convict had told him it was.

In Santa Cruz, while the investigators piled up the evidence against him, McMonigle recanted again, "I never shot anybody. I was framed," he hold them.

Special Agent George Busch entered his cell and tried a bluff that the suspect fell for wholeheartedly. "If you never shot anybody," Busch wanted to know, "how about that bullet we took from the window post on the righthand side of your car?"

The suspect laughed. "You never found any bullet. You couldn't have. There wasn't any to find."

There was a bullet and you know there was one," Busch persisted. "What's more, we're going to use it to help convict you."

"You couldn't have found it," McMonigle retorted. "I threw it away."

Busch leaned forward. "Where, McMonigle? Where did you throw it?"

Aware that he had slipped, the suspect hesitated, then tried to laugh it off. "Sure, I'll tell you where. But it won't do you any good. I was cleaning my gun and it went off accidentally. That's how it got there."

"Then it doesn't matter if you tell us where you threw it," Busch insisted.

"It's under the large oak tree about a hundred yards south of my house on Poplar Street," McMonigle informed him.

While Busch made the trip back to San Mateo, Oliver H. Duggins, bureau technician from Washington, D. C., reported to Connelly on the upholstery and trousers found by Elledge.

"There was a large amount of human blood on the upholstery," he observed, "and some on the trousers. It's too bad we can't tell how long it has been there, or whose it is. I can tell you one thing though. It's not McMonigle's."

Busch returned the following day from San Mateo and dropped a tiny lead pellet on Connelly's desk. "I'd be willing to bet my next month's wages this is the bullet that killed Thora Chamberlain," he remarked, "but we haven't even got a gun, so how are we going to prove anything?"

Connelly reached under his desk and returned with a small handbag. "We've got a gun all right," he told Busch. "Look what Duane Taylor sent us from Quincy yesterday." He reached into the bag and promptly produced a .32-caliber automatic, several bullets, and a service clip.

"Where did Traynor get that?" Busch wanted to know.

"Thomas Haynes, the manager of the Park Hotel in Quincy, gave the bag to him," Connelly replied. "For some reason McMonigle left the hotel so quickly, he forgot that bag and never returned for it. Traynor says Hayes is willing to come and testify to that if he is needed. I'm going to have Heilman examine your bullet along with these under the spectroscope."

W. R. Heilman, another bureau technician from Washington, D. C., arrived on the scene and tested the bullets. His report not only showed that Busch's bullet had been fired from McMonigle's gun, but also revealed that it had been made in the same batch as the ones taken from the bag.

After hearing of the great store of evidence against him, McMonigle confessed for the third time, this time claiming that he had strangled the girl and buried her body beside a lane off the coast road in San Mateo County.

Shortly after this third confession, the court appointed Sanford Smith, famed California defense attorney, now living in semi-retirement at Santa Cruz, to defend the accused slayer. Immediately, McMonigle denied his confession and claimed he was innocent. In spite of his attorney, however, he continued to make confessions, then recant. The count rose to seven official confessions, and three unofficial. The eighth came on the last day of his regular murder trial in the Santa Cruz Superior Court. Against the advice of his attorney he took the witness stand and faced the jury.

"Thora Chamberlain is dead," he told the jury, "but she died accidentally. I was giving her a lift home and when we passed the road she asked to be let off at, she became frightened, leaped from the car, and was killed. I didn't know what to do, so I rode around for a while, then wrapped the body in some blankets, and left it alongside a county road about two miles outside of Campbell."

"Is this another one of your phony stories, McMonigle?" shouted John McCarthy, District Attorney Wyckoff's assistant prosecutor. "or are you telling the truth?"

"This is the truth, sir," McMonigle replied. "I'll take the jury there and show them the body."

Immediately Wyckoff was on his feet requesting permission from the court to take the jury to Santa Clara County to search for the body. Arrangements were made and the trial was recessed until the journey could be made the next day. Special provisions were made to protect McMonigle during his visit to Campbell. Sheriff Emig established road blocks along the route to the area pointed out by the accused man, and Connelly stationed a security squad of FBI agents along the route. But, while the whole court appeared ready to search in the rain for the missing body, McMonigle changed his mind again. He told the court he was afraid there would be a repetition of the Brooke Hart lynching and he would be the victim.

The trial resumed. With the overwhelming evidence compiled for him by Emig, Cuffaro, Chief O'Brien, Sheriff Devitt, and Connelly and his agents, Wyckoff was able to secure a verdict of first degree murder without recommendation for leniency, thirty-seven minutes after the jury left the courtroom on February 19, 1946. Court records revealed that the McMonigle verdict was only the third of its kind ever turned in by a Santa Cruz jury.

He was executed in San Quentin's gas chamber two years later.

The man coughed again. "Handkerchief," he spluttered. "I've got to get my handkerchief."

Still coughing, he reached into his coat. Driscoll let his hand wander away from his gun. After all, the man was coughing. A fraction of a second later he was staring incredulously into the yawning mouth of a forty-five caliber automatic. Behind it the delinquent husband had dropped his embarrassed air. The slouching body was now stiff and taut, and Driscoll saw death in the staring eyes. The gunman spoke calmly in a voice edged with steel.

"Don't move," he commanded. "If either of you moves an inch I'll blow his head off."

The two officer froze in their seats. There was death in the bandit's voice. Slowly and with the infinite caution of one who has spent years outside the law, he opened the rear door and slid into the seat. Not for a moment did the automatic waver from its bearing on Driscoll's head. For the moment at least it would be suicide to resist him. The gunman chuckled grimly.

"Now get this thing started and swing it around," he ordered. "You guys are going to take me and my pal for a ride. Turn east on Haight Street and we'll pick him up."

Bekelund threw the car into gear and made a slow U turn. Icy perspiration formed in little beads across his brow. His passenger was a killer. Any excuse would be enough to send hot lead searing through the two officers. Years of evading the law had probably developed a hatred for police in the man that was almost maniacal. To pick up the second bandit would almost certainly leave a double murder on the hands of the homicide squad. Two APB officers found dead in the morning at some quiet spot along the beach. As long as they were two to one they had a chance.

"Your friend went west," he told the bandit.

"Turn west then," said the gunman. "And we'll better find him. Then we'll all have a little party."

Bekelund swung west and the car crawled along Haight Street. Time was the thing now. Time and a break and an idea. Every foot they progressed along Haight Street to the west took them further from the bandit's partner. Bekelund had caught a fleeting glimpse of him turning east just before he had stopped the car on Broderick.

For a few brief moments silence reigned while the gunman peered along the empty streets, hoping to spot his missing pal. When the lights of the Hub, where Haight Street terminates at Market, loomed close he realized he had been tricked. Savagely he turned on Bekelund.

"All right, bright boy, we're through playing games," he announced. "Get back there and find my pal... Fast, if you want to live."

With a grim little smile, Bekelund executed another U turn and headed back up Haight Street. The car crawled along at a snail's pace.

"Step on it, I said," ordered the bandit. Bekelund's foot clamped down upon the accelerator and the car picked up speed. Soon they had passed Broderick and were approaching Golden Gate Park. But it was too late. The streets were empty, save for a lone patrolman trying doors in the neighborhood business district. The bandit cursed.

"Pull into that alley and stop," he commanded, indicating a lonely little excuse for a street. Bekelund wheeled the car into the shadows and brought it to a stop.

"Now reach, coppers, and I'll relieve you of the excess hardware."

The two policemen lifted their hands skyward reluctantly. Cautiously the gunman reached across the seat and took Driscoll's revolver from its holster. For a split second he was fully occupied with one man. It was all the time Bekelund needed.

Keeping his right hand in the air, the policeman let his left drop to his gun belt and released the catch. Noiselessly the weapon slithered to the floor. When the bandit's attention returned to him both hands were in the air, but his feet were busy, kicking the vital weapon back out of sight. Swiftly the bandit frisked him.

"Where's your heater?" he wanted to know.

"I don't carry one," Bekelund answered crisply.

"Don't hand me that," replied the bandit. "Every cop carries a gun. Why haven't you got one?"

"This is an accident investigation car," Bekelund explained. "Our regular tools are cameras, tape measures, and notebooks. We only carry one gun and out here in the Park district it's usually so quiet we don't even need that. Look all you want. You won't find one."

Once again the bandit fell for the ruse. Pocketing Driscoll's gun he sank back in the seat. "OK. So you haven't got a gun. Get this thing started."

At Haight and Stanyan Streets, less than a block from Golden Gate Park Police Station, the gunman instinctively ordered the pair to turn left, away from the station, and then right again on Lincoln Way, a boulevard paralleling the park. Visions of a lonely death in the dark depths of the park crossed the minds of the captive policemen. They were approaching Second Avenue when the passenger ordered another stop. When Beke-lund followed his directions, the bandit stopped from the back door.

"Get out," he ordered. Driscoll opened the door and stepped from the car. Beke-lund sat still. This was it. In a moment he would be separated from his gun and completely at the mercy of what looked to him like a vicious killer. It was now or never. A new idea flashed across his brain.

"The car's sliding," he told the gun-man. "I'd better put on the hand brake."

"OK. But make it snappy. I want to get this over with."

For a brief moment, while he reached toward the brake, Bekelund was shielded from the bandit by the open door. He reached past the brake to the floor and felt the smooth rounded butt of the revolver caress his hand. His hand crept to the door handle. Then, like a bolt of blue uniformed lightning, he lunged from the car, shattering the early morning silence with a snap shot at the startled bandit as he did so.

Bekelund's aim had been good, but the open door that was so recently his friend, turned traitor and deflected the bullet which would have ended the bandit's life. The policeman dashed for the cover of a light pole.

"That does it," the bandit cursed, and the heavy crash of the forty-five sent a bullet winging past Bekelund's ears. Meanwhile Driscoll, completely un-armed, faced death from two directions as he stood between the pair. Bekelund held his fire while the bandit retreated, shoot-ting steadily and cursing. Driscoll dropped to the pavement.

"You'd better give up," Bekelund shouted to the gunman. His reply was an- other burst of fire and an angry roar of laughter as the bandit stepped back into the jungle-like foliage of the park. Beke-lund had counted the shots. The bandit's gun should be empty. Slowly he poked his head around the pole, but two bullets, singing close by reminded him that his adversary was armed with Driscoll's gun as well as his own.

The embattled officer fired blindly into the darkness. A mist shrouded flash and the roar of the bandit's gun gave him his direction. Advancing now, he answered the bandit's fire. For a few brief seconds the battle roared on. Then the police-man's attack was met with an empty sil-ence. He stopped firing and listened. In the distance he could hear his quarry crashing through the thick shrubbery.

With the disarmed Driscoll at his heels, Bekelund rushed toward the park and searched frantically through the cul-tivated jungle. Before long they realized the futility of their undermanned search, returned to the bullet riddled car, and called communications for help. Soon officers from Golden Gate Park and Taraval Stations joined the search and swarmed through the shrubbery en masse, but the darkness, the early morning mist, and the thick foliage guarded the retreat of the brash gunman, and he escaped.

Because of the poor light, neither of the officers was able to give more than a cursory description of the bandit. But there was one point they were sure of. His eyes. Bekelund and Driscoll were in solid agreement regarding the man's eyes.

"They were killer's eyes," the pair reported to the Bureau of Inspectors later. "They were the hardest eyes we've ever seen. And they didn't show one spark of emotion."

In spite of a concentrated search that morning, starting at 100 Harrison Street, and fanning through the entire city, no shred of evidence was uncovered that would reveal the identity of the two men. The officers' report, plus a supplementary report by the Inspectors on duty, was laid on the desk of Captain of Inspectors Bernard J. McDonald. A grim line formed itself along the Captain's mouth as he read it.

"We've got to get those men," he said, when he finished. "If we don't, they'll kill someone." We know that they'll pull a gun at the slightest excuse."

In spite of the Captain's words, the police ran into a blank wall during their early search for the pair. Their description of the man who had shot it out with Bekelund was scanty. They had even less on his companion who had walked south on Broderick.

For two weeks no clue was uncovered that would unveil the bandits. Then, on January 28, Mike Sutter opened his small grocery at 300 Turk Street, in the heart of San Francisco's Tenderloin. As he entered the door he noticed two men standing nearby. He kicked the door stop into place and turned around. The duo had followed him in.

"Anything I can do for you gentlemen?" he inquired, thinking they were early morning customers who had awaited his opening.

"Yeah. You can put up your hands," one of the 'gentlemen' ordered. Sutter looked into his eyes and raised his hands. He didn't need to look down to see the pair of forty-five caliber automatics leveled at his stomach.

"Get inside," the holdup man ordered, motioning with his gun. "Behind the counter."

Sutter turned and took his position behind the counter, close to the cash register. As he did so, one of the duo stepped behind him, pocketed his gun, whipped out his handkerchief, gagged him, bound him, and then knocked the helpless storekeeper to the floor behind the counter.

Having disposed of the proprietor, the bandit turned his attention to the cash register and was scooping out the previous afternoon's receipts when Gus Sutter, the groceryman's brother, entered the store.

"What's going on in here?" he demanded angrily, focusing his gaze on the man at the cash register.

"A holdup, sucker. Now, reach!" The harsh voice of the man standing guard brought Gus whirling around. For the first time he was aware that there were two men present. He doubled his fists and moved toward the bandits.

"I'll reach that ugly face of yours and shove that gun down your throat," Gus retorted, and, matching his words with actions, stepped forward and seized the gun before the gunman realized what was happening. His finger tightened on the trigger, but too late to stop his enraged victim. The automatic roared, but the slug traveled harmlessly toward the rear of the store, rupturing a can and leaving a puddle of fruit juice in its wake. A tense, dramatic struggle for possession of the weapon ensued, as the pair crashed to the floor amid a downpour of cans and glassware.

Meanwhile, in comic contrast, the man at the cash register calmly emptied the till, relieved Mike of his personal funds, pulled a black jack from his pocket and proceeded across the store at a leisurely gait to stand waiting at the outer fringe of battle. In a moment the opportunity he wanted presented itself and he ended the fight with a dull crunching slap of the club against Sutter's skull. Without a word or a wasted motion, the pair searched the inert body, took the cash, and fled with $475.

Some distance from the store one of the bandits turned to his companion and grinned complacently:

"Perfect," he remarked. "A little rough, but perfect."

The second bandit nodded, then caught his breath as he glanced at his partner. He ran his hand over his own thinning hair and cursed.

"Not quite perfect," he replied caustically. "We forgot our hats."

Back at the grocery Gus Sutter struggled to his feet and stumbled to the telephone. He fumbled with the dial and after several foggy attempts managed to get the police operator at the Hall of Justice and deliver a jumbled account of the robbery.

Radio officers responding to the call a few moments later found him making a feeble attempt to loosen the bonds that held his brother. Quickly they completed his task and called Central Emergency Hospital for an ambulance to take care of Gus, whose scalp had been laid wide open by the vicious blow from the blackjack. Then, while one listened to the brothers' account of the robbery, his partner put through a call to Lieutenant James G. Malloy, head of the robbery detail at that time.

The Lieutenant made a few quick notes, cradeled the phone and summoned Inspector Frank McCann, veteran of years of warfare against crime and violence, to his desk.

"You and Bill go out to 300 Turk Street and see what you can find out about a holdup there," he instructed. "They tied up the owner, gagged him, and slugged his brother."

A short time later McCann and his partner, William McMahon, the two most decorated officers in the San Francisco Police Department, arrived at the grocery to question Mike. The storekeeper's description of the robbery was good, but he could offer no satisfactory description of the two bandits.

"Isn't there anything outstanding you can remember?" asked McMahon.

Mike shook his head. "Nothing. Except the guy who fought with Gus. It sounds funny, but he looked like a killer. He had the coldest face I ever saw, and he never blinked his eyes.

Satisfied that Mike had given them all the information he could, the inspectors went to the emergency hospital to hear Gus' tale. It tallied with his brother's perfectly, but he too was unable to give an adequate description of the bandits.

"Except for one thing," he told McCann. "The one I fought with. He must have had ice water for blood. There was something about him. His eyes, maybe. I know I'll never forget them."

Back at the robbery detail McCann laid the hats on Malloy's desk.

"One was bought in Tacoma and the other in Seattle," he told the Lieutenant. "But they're cheap hats and we won't be able to track down anybody with them."

"Probably not," Malloy agreed. "But we'll send them up to the laboratory and let Frank LaTulipe look them over. Maybe he can find something. Is there anything else?"

"There was one shot fired," McMahon informed him. "It went through a can of fruit juice and into the wall. One of the boys from Central Station is digging it out."

"That could help," the Lieutenant observed. "If we could find a gun to go with it, it would help a lot."

"Something had better help," mused McCann. "Why?"

The ace detective regarded his Lieutenant silently for a moment with steady, steel gray eyes. "Because," he speculated, "I've got a hunch. I think these two gunmen are the same ones Driscoll and Beke-lund ran into. And if they are, they're killers."

The trail of the grocery store robbers was one with a dead end, and the desks of McCann and McMahon soon became choked with a succession of other crimes, ranging from cheap strongarms to full fledged robberies.

San Francisco was a hotbed of crime during the winter and early spring of 1944. Soldiers and sailors, just returned from Pacific battle fronts, jammed the downtown areas, their pockets bulging with money they could not spend overseas. With them came a heavy sprinkling of merchant seamen who carried bankrolls of hundreds, and sometimes thousands of dollars with them while they roamed in search of entertainment along the Embarcadero.

The city became a mecca for hoodlums throughout the entire west, drawn irresistibly by the greenback bonanza. Old time con men revived the pigeon drop. An enterprising salesman sold a Municipal Railway streetcar, a second Coit Tower, while a third man made his living accepting advance payments for rooms in non-existent hotels.

But where one hood lived with his wits, a hundred existed by brute force. The Mickey Finn, a black jack, or the explosive threat of firearms, were the tools of the rank and file. Every night close to a thousand dollars lost in robberies was recorded on the "big fourteen," the terse daily report of the city's major crimes. Burdened with every hopeless drunk rolling and purse snatching, Frisco's over-worked and undermanned robbery detail struggled to keep its head above water. The Turk Street affair shrank into insignificance while Lieutenant Malloy and his men pursued their endless task. But it lingered in the photographic memory of Inspector Frank McCann, and, because it was unsolved, festered there, like an angry ulcer.

"They'll try again," he told Malloy, "and I'll get them. I just hope they don't kill anybody before I do."

The Inspector was right. Andrew Marty and his lovely daughter, Wilma, were at work in their cleaning plant at 174 Fourteenth Street when the sinister pair entered. Wilma's pleasant greeting was answered with a harsh command.

"All right, sister, Lie down on the floor and don't make a sound."

The gaping mouth of the speaker's automatic was all the convincing the girl needed. Within a few seconds one bandit bound her hand and foot with electricians tape, while the other searched for her father in the rear of the shop. He found the proprietor at a pressing machine and escorted him to a position beside his daughter. Soon he too was securely trussed with a combination of wire and tape. As the two yeggs moved toward the cash register Joseph Collins, a driver, interrupted them. Both bandits leveled their guns.

"Get behind the counter and lie down with the others."

Collins stood still, eyeing the guns. "Stop kidding," he countered. "You can't scarce me with these toys."

The tall bandit stepped forward, glaring at the driver with starry, unblinking eyes.

"You lie down," he commanded, "or I'll take this toy and put a hole through your belly with it. Then I'll kick your teeth out."

The flat, baleful stare in the gunman's eyes convinced Collins that discretion was the better part of valor. He took his place beside Andrew Marty and his daughter. As he knelt to the floor one of the mobsters sent a vicious kick crashing into his ribs.

"Faster, you louse. We haven't got all day," growled his tormentor.

While one of the duo applied the wire and tape to Collins, the second scooped the cash from the till and turned his attention to Marty's pockets. There he discovered and took possession of a handsome gold watch, which had been in the victim's family for generations. His partner found Collins' pockets empty except for two religious medals. He showed them to his pal.

"These are for luck, aren't they?" he inquired.

"Something like that. It's more like protection. Do you want them?"

"Not me. I don't need any protection."

"Then give them to me," requested the hoodlum. "I need a good luck piece."

"I'll say you do. Look!"

The bandit looked up in time to see a woman back away from the door and dash down the street toward the corner grocery. He drew his gun and leveled it toward her.

"If you want to live, stop!" he shouted. But the woman, Virginia Padilla, continued her headlong flight. Once inside the store she rushed to the telephone and called Mission police station. Officer Anthony Eberly responded immediately, but when he arrived the bandits were gone with $1000 in cash, some checks, and the watch and medals. This time the bandits had not left as much as a hat for a clue.

"What did they look like?" Eberly asked the victims.

"Just like anybody else," both Mary and Collins responded. "They were middle aged, fairly tall, and slim. Light complexions and brown eyes. They both wore hats and light business suits."

"Wasn't there any outstanding quality?" the officer inquired.

"I noticed one," interjected Wilma Marty. "The tallest one was a killer. I can't put my finger on it, but there was something about his face that frightened me. It must be his eyes. They never blinked."

Eberly's report found its way to the inspector's bureau and was subsequently routed to the robbery detail. Lieutenant Malloy laid it out on Frank McCann's desk.

"I think you'll recognize a couple of old friends there," Malloy told him.

McCann studied the report, smiled grimly, and nodded. "These are my boys, all right," he agreed. He studied the report. "I'll get them. I only hope its before they pull the trigger on one of those forty-five and kill somebody."

In spite of his persistence, however, McCann could not unearth any evidence that would uncover the identity of the two desperados. His only clues were two hats and the spent bullet found in the store at 300 Turk Street. From Marty he got a detailed description of the heirloom watch and passed it on to the pawnshop detail, but a vigorous search by those inspectors unearthed nothing.

"They were too smart to hock it," McCann mused. "The watch is too unusual and too hot for them to take any chances. These two are like ghosts who come from nowhere and fade into thin air."

The first break in the Inspector's seemingly hopeless search came when Sergeant Frank J. Matlin received a telephone call in the bureau of communications. A woman spoke in low tones.

"There's a man at the Klondike Hotel at 328 Leavenworth Street that you ought to see."

"Who is speaking?" demanded the sergeant.

"It's none of your business who's speaking," the voice responded. "He carries a forty-five automatic and someday he'll use it." Matlin heard the receiver click and the monotonous buzz of the dial tone. He relayed the information to the inspectors Bureau.

"It's probably a crank," he told Lieutenant Ed Hippley. "But there might be something in it."

Hippley nodded. Anonymous calls are ordinarily of little value to the police department, however, any report of a man with a gun could not be ignored. An officer from Northern Station was sent to investigate. Almost immediately the officer called Sergeant Harry Majors in the robbery detail.

"Before I go any further with this I think you ought to know that the owner of the Klondike Hotel is Floyd Richardson," the policeman informed him.

"I'll say we ought to," Majors exclaimed. "Stand by, but don't go into the place. We'll send some more men out."

Richardson, a two time loser in California, had been known in San Francisco as a holdup man since the early twenties. After being released from San Quentin where he served time on a robbery charge, he had returned to stage a series of vicious holdups before being apprehended and sent to Folsom. Soon he was released and he moved his base of operations to Washington. Before long he shot and killed a Seattle officer and was sent to the State Penitentiary at Walla Walla for life. But there was mockery in the life sentence. Seventeen years after he entered the prison, Floyd Richardson was paroled.

Malloy received Major's news with grim satisfaction. "If he's got a gun, he's a parole violator. We'll send him back up where he can't bother use for a while anyway. But we'd better go ready for trouble."

A short time later Inspectors McCann, Fred Butz, O'Leary, Murphy, Doherty, Wafer and Reznik converged on the Leavenworth Street address. They moved cautiously, ready for any break the bandit might make. Entering the first floor they ran into a startling discovery. The Klondike Hotel, supposedly a hostelry in one of the world's most overcrowded cities, was apparently empty.

Baffled, the inspectors moved to the second floor. The silence stifled them as they stalked an unseen foe through empty rooms and corridors. A scarlet flush of rage clouded Malloy's face.

"There's been a tipoff," he muttered, moving toward the third and last floor. Once again the officers opened the doors to empty rooms. But one room was locked. Inspector Walter Reznik tried the door, then stepped back quickly.

"Open that door," he shouted, "Or I'll shoot it open."

"Keep your shirt on," came the shrill feminine reply. "We've got to get some clothes on."

A few moments later the bewildered officers were the unexpected guests of three young and curvaceous kimono clad girls. At first the trio was sullen and reticent. They told Malloy that they lived in the hotel, did not know the owner, and that they worked as waitresses.

"Don't kid me," responded Malloy. "I know what you do."

"Prove it," responded 'Boots,' a blonde.

The girls' reticence disappeared, however, when the Lieutenant explained that a doctor's examination was all the evidence he would need to restrict their liberty and added that a woman's court might be lenient to someone who had helped the police break a bigger case. In halting sentences the three told him that Floyd Richardson had become proprietor of the Hotel some months before and that he had persuaded them to work for him.

"In what capacity?" inquired Malloy. "You know what we do," came the bitter reply.

Throughout the investigation, the inspectors all noticed that the three girls appeared jealous of each other and assumed that, in spite of their apparent early reticence, the tipoff had come from one of them. However, none of them was able to throw light on any of the holdups. Richardson had somehow understood that something was wrong and departed. Lieutenant Malloy prepared to take the girls on to be booked on a vice charge with quarantine recommendations. Inspector McCann hesitated.

"I don't want to leave," he announced, "until we have searched this place with a fine toothed comb."

"Good idea," replied Malloy. "I'll leave you some men."

Unhampered by the danger of hidden guns, the detectives went back over their tracks with painstaking care. Inspector Fred Butz showed McCann two bits of metal found in what the girls said was Richardson's room. McCann's eyes gleamed.

"For an old con," he remarked, "Richardson was not so smart. 'I'll bet my bottom dollar those are the religious medals taken from Collins at the White House Cleaners.'"

Every available hiding place, from the attic to the basement, was covered by the clue hungry policemen. In the cellar McCann called for a shovel. With infinite patience he began sifting the ashes that lay in the grate of the furnace. In the dim light he soon looked more like a phantom than a man as a grey film of ashes covered his perspiration soaked features. He studied each shovel load minutely, sifting it carefully. Slowly he gathered a little pile of brown and blackened bits of paper. He scraped these carefully into paste board box and took them with him.

"I've got a hunch these scraps of paper, plus the medals, will be all we need to send Floyd Richardson back to prison for a long time," he remarked.

At headquarters he called the White House Cleaners and left word for driver Collins to report to the robbery detail as soon as possible. Then he took his box of ashes to the sixth floor laboratory of Police Criminologist Frank LaTulipe and stood by watching the crime chemist mix his magic potions. A call from Malloy summoned him back to the robbery detail. Collins was there waiting for him. The detective showed him the medals.

"Are these yours," he asked.

Collins nodded. "They're mine all right. One of the bandits took them from me during the holdup. He said he wanted them for good luck pieces."

McCann nodded and reached for the phone. "Bureau of Identification," he ordered briskly. Then: "Get out the pictures of Floyd Richardson, I'll be right up." He turned to Collins: "I want you to see if you recognize this man. Come with me."

Confronted with the photograph, Collins hesitated. "It looks like the man," he admitted, "but I don't want to send up an innocent man. The bandit was wearing a hat and I couldn't be sure."

The pair returned to the robbery detail. Inspector Butz looked up from his work. "Frank LaTulipe just called down. He says he's got something to show you."

Once again the detective hurried up-stairs. LaTulipe showed him a blackened rectangle. Chemical magic clearly revealed a check made out to the White House Cleaners. McCann smiled.

"These ought to be the clincher. When we catch Floyd Richardson, I think we'll have at least half of our holdup team," he told the criminologist. "Are there any more?"

"I think so," replied LaTulipe. "I'll finish them as soon as possible."

Hoping to pick up the ex-con quickly, McCann went to the City Prison to resume his interrogation of the three girls. In Marie, the tired looking brunette mother of a little boy, he found the soft spot.

"I'll help you all I can," she told him, "if you'll get me out of this jam. I've got a kid and I want to get out of this racket. I would have a long time ago, but I was afraid of Floyd and Boots."

"Why Boots?" inquired McCann.

"Boots was Richardson's special girl friend. He seemed to be crazy about her." Marie went on to tell McCann that the ex-con had carried on a series of conferences with a mysterious visitor whose name and address she did not know. She added that she could not give a description of the man because he had always come at night and his face was obscured by shadows.

It was the tip from Marie that caused the detective to request that the three girls be released as soon as possible. Richardson, sensing a trap, had not returned to the Klondike Hotel, where several patrolmen awaited him; but McCann believed that the ex-con's soft spot was probably Boots and that he would attempt to see her as soon as she was released. Meanwhile, he carried his search to the underworld. About the same time Bill McMahon, his partner of many years, suffered a complete physical breakdown and was taken to a hospital.

Because he blamed his partner's breakdown on overwork brought on by the activities of such men as Richardson, McCann carried on the search alone, more determined than ever to round up the bandit. On Eddy Street he rounded up one "Mouse" Malone, a petty thief, for questioning.

Malone, hardened to police questioning, was sarcastic. He carried a message from Richardson.

"Sure he's in town," he said, "but I don't know where. He says you'd better get measured for a wooden overcoat, hot-shot. He's going to add to your lead collection."

Malone's statement was nothing new to McCann. Throughout the Inspector's Bureau the rumor persisted that Richardson was out gunning for the detective. The policeman's reputation with a gun was a vivid thing in the underworld. His days as a patrolman in the Bush Street district had been punctuated with a series of blazing gun battles in which he had always emerged the victor, but not without several trips to the hospital himself. The challenge was all McCann needed. He requested and received permission to devote his full time to the Richardson case.

Pictures of the ex-con were sent to every police department along the Pacific coast. In spite of Richardson's challenge, McCann was convinced that he had left town. Soon a series of salmon boat robberies along the Columbia River in Oregon convinced McCann he was right. The description of the pair of river pirates who were robbing the fishing boats tallied exactly with those given by the duo's victims in San Francisco. McCann turned his attention back to Malone, hauled him in, and accused him of being Richardson's accomplice. Terror stricken, Malone talked.

"I only saw him with Joe Torino and Al Wagner in the Yellow Bell on Howard Street," he confessed. "He said he would never be taken alive and that if he had to go he was going to take you with him. Then he told them he had to go up north and meet a friend."

McCann promptly called in Tornino and Wagner, both ex-convicts. "Who was the friend?" the detective demanded.

"Floyd wouldn't say," Tornino responded. "He wouldn't even tell where the guy was from."

Further questioning revealed that the pair believed that Richardson would return to town to see his old girl friend, Boots. Beyond that they claimed they knew nothing. McCann sent out a call to pick up Boots.

"That will take some doing," the patrolman on the street told him. "Boots has pulled a vanishing act. We were watching the place, but she disappeared one night and never came back. Never even packed a bag."

Still McCann pursued his task stubbornly. He issued a picture and detailed description of the blonde and ordered a careful watch kept for her at all neighborhood bars and grocery stores. Soon a call came from Northern station.

"There's a blonde answering the description of Boots living at the 400 block on Steiner," the officer told him. "She doesn't leave the house, but I've seen her come out to pick up the paper. Shall I pick her up?"

"No," McCann told him. "But keep a detail watching the house. I'll be there when the milk arrives."

The next day the detective watched the same voluptuous blonde he had met at the Klondike Hotel earlier. Unwilling to risk losing his quarry, the detective waited for another tenant to leave the house, followed him down the street, then requested that he come to headquarters for questioning. He got the information he wanted.

"There's a man living with the girl," the tenant told him. "He never leaves the room, but I can hear him talking."

Once again a posse, headed by Lieutenant Malloy, set out to round up Floyd Richardson. The building was surrounded and the policemen closed in on it. But the wily ex-con had outwitted them again. They found Boots, horribly bruised, alone in her room.

"He sensed you were coming," she told them, "and went over the back fence. Thank God you did come. He thought I squealed and was torturing me. I was nothing more than a prisoner here."

Soon after Boots was picked up, Washington prison authorities sent information that helped to unravel another thread in the mystery McCann was trying to solve. Soon after Richardson's parole from Walla Walla, Leigh Haskell Fowler, a bandit serving twenty years for robbery committed in Bellingham, Washington, had gone "over the wall" amidst a hail of bullets and made good his escape. He had been Richardson's closest pal in the penitentiary. A photograph of Fowler was sent to all district stations and departments. It bore unexpected fruit. Larry Driscoll and Ray Bekelund rushed to McCann.

"Fowler is the man who took us for a ride," Driscoll told him. "I'll never forget that the killer's look in his eyes as long as I live."

Immediately McCann summoned the Martyrs, the Sutter brothers, and Collins. From all the answer, was the same: "I'll never forget that face."

Examining Fowler's record following the escape from Walla Walla, McCann was more than ever impressed by the need for his capture. After a series of robberies in the Pacific Northwest he had been traced to a Skagit County tavern which he held up in December 1943. He shot and seriously wounded a soldier who interfered with the last holdup and fled to San Francisco in a stolen car.

Apparently the duo had returned to the northwest in a stolen car following their winter holdups in Frisco. McCann however, was positive that the pair returned to San Francisco, a hunch that was proven correct by his brush with Boots in the Steiner Street house. Not only that, but he felt that he needed more evidence to convict Fowler.

"Maybe he'll confess," the detective mused, "but if he doesn't, you can never tell how a jury will act."

Once again the detective returned to the Howard Street dive where Tornino and Wagner spent their leisure hours. They reported that they had not seen Richardson, but pointed out a soldier who might have.

"I knew a guy named Floyd who answers that description," the soldier responded to McCann's questions. "I used to drink with him out in a Castro Street tavern. A blonde was always with him. You ought to find her there now. You can't miss the tavern, because the blonde is always there. I've forgotten its name."

The detective found the tavern and the blonde. "Sure I know Floyd," she told him. "But I don't know where he is now. Maybe Hollywood. He said something about going to live with the movie stars."

HIGHWAY HOUSEKEEPING

Every year California's State Highway Department spends substantial sums in removing the beverage containers, tissues, wrappers, paper and other litter which careless motorists toss out on the roads. All this could be avoided, and the money which is spent for such housekeeping devoted to other purposes, says the California State Automobile Association, if the motorist would merely carry a paper bag in his car and use it for trash, later depositing bag and contents in a suitable container for disposal.

Three out of four accidents involve passenger cars.

THE OLD AND THE NEW

ample, Chief Coleman has instituted many reforms of his own. He has campaigned constantly to bring the numerical strength of the force to the standards recommended by figures compiled by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Chief Coleman believes that an alert and well trained force is necessary to properly police the city. He insists that Merced Police Department be represented in every training school in the area.

To augment the regular police department a police reserve was organized in the summer of 1951. The reserve corps consists of 30 men each of whom has supplied his own uniform and equipment.

Lucius Cornell left a prosperous hay and grain business in 1934 to take over the reins as sheriff. He remembers that things were pretty rough in Merced County in those days. The county was what might have been called wide open and some people were perfectly satisfied with the status quo.

The county was just recovering from prohibition and lawlessness and large segments were still looking on such activities with amused tolerance.

Sheriff Cornell did not regard the situation in quite the same light. He felt that he was elected to uphold law and order rather than regulate the underworld and started to clean things up. His work was cut out for him. Enough persons were making a profit from illegal operations to place every obstacle possible in his path. Slowly the sheriff won his battle. Merced County became as clean and orderly as any county of comparable size in California and Cornell continued to win elections in spite of an element which fondly remembered the good old days and did its best to retore them.

Today, after five terms in office, the main problem facing the sheriff is the county jail. Like many peace officers all over the country, he has discovered that the last place the taxpayers want to see their money go is into a penal institution. He is frank to admit that jail conditions are not ideal but points out that by stretching a little a long way and concentrating on cleanliness he has made the place at least livable. Not long ago a Merced Grand Jury complimented him on doing the best he could under the circumstances.

More than 15,800 persons were killed in week end traffic accidents last year.

If you make an extended trip this summer, don't be disappointed when you discover that people who live in other parts of the country are not exactly like yourself, suggests the California State Automobile Association. It's true that the citizens of all the states are Americans but those who live away from California have their own customs, their own distinctive foods and sometimes ways of living which time and experience have proved best for their climate, just as we have.

Sample those local foods; you'll probably find them delicious. Who, for instance, can know what good things we have to eat here in this state unless he has tried avocado, artichokes or abalone? Who knows New Orleans until he has eaten pompano and the genuine Creole gumbo? And the same applies to other regions.

Get acquainted with local customs, too.

Last year was the fourth consecutive year of increase in the traffic death toll.

Dear John and Mary O'Haire:

We just wanted to congratulate you, John,
and wish you good luck, Mary.

We don't quite understand what all the fuss has been about—people who fall in love are getting married every day—but as long as things are as they are we want to get our two cents in.

Just to wish you a long and happy married life and the best of good luck. And we are sure you will have both.

Sincerely,

"A STITCH IN TIME"

As so many Sonoma county peace officers have done, Chief Melvin "Dutch" Flohr of the Santa Rosa Police Department began his law enforcement work in the Sonoma County Sheriff's office in 1934. He worked in Healdsburg in 1938 and in 1940 accepted the post of Chief of Police of the Santa Rosa department.

Transient labor, with a good sprinkling of wetbacks, present Chief Flohr with a problem he shares with many other California chiefs. Added to this are Indians who live in the area and go on Saturday night "tears" which threaten to rip the lid off the town. The drunk tank gets full to the brim on many week-ends, the load consisting mostly of Mexicans who have entered the country illegally and are awaiting the arrival of United States Immigration officers, and transient revelers who have imbibed too frequently and not too well.

Traffic is a problem Chief Flohr shares with a multitude of others in his profession. United States Highway 101 not only carries a full load of passenger cars headed for northern resort areas through Santa Rosa during the summer, but adds to its burden a great degree of heavy trucking which is headed for the redwood lumber country.

"Our local crime we can contain pretty well," Chief Flohr declares. "But we are vulnerable to a certain amount of crooks passing through because we are near the San Francisco Bay Area."

To this the chief adds that, while he does not want to indicate that the Bay Area is unusually crime ridden, that habitual criminals seem to gravitate naturally to densely populated areas.

Chief Flohr believes firmly that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure and his whole law enforcement program is directed toward that end.

The Chief claims that 75 percent of his department's work is crime prevention and to make this effective he concentrates his prevention program on juveniles in the age bracket of from six to 18 years.

The Chief believes that effecting a close relationship between youngsters and the police department will instill a greater respect for the law in Santa Rosa's youth and thus far, for the most part, his formula has worked.

To stimulate interest in his juvenile program Chief Flohr and three of his men, Lieut. William Clark, Inspector Leland Gleeson and Officer George Scinto, conduct a four-month boxing and wrestling program which attracts an astounding total of 125 youths into each course.

These youngsters hold a series of intersquad matches and wind up their intramural season with a match against a San Francisco Boys' Club. These matches are invariably a sell-out and the proceeds derived from ticket sales are used to continue the program.

CHIEF MELVIN FLOHR

In addition to the boxing program, Chief Flohr personally supervises a Junior Traffic Patrol which is divided into four squads and includes 175 members. He also makes it a point to maintain a close relationship between school authorities and the police department, thus when a juvenile does go astray, he can locate the guilty youngster almost immediately. The three-way program has helped keep Santa Rosa's juvenile delinquency rate well below the national average to say nothing of moulding better citizens in later life.

With an incorporated community of approximately 20,000 persons to watch over, plus another 30,000 in the fringe area outside the city, Chief Flohr and his men have a multitude of problems facing them. He has combined intelligence with careful planning to make his program of crime prevention and law enforcement operate smoothly.

His prevention program advances well beyond the juvenile stage. Bad check artists, who present a major problem to many California peace officers, find their activities greatly inhibited in Santa Rosa. Chief Flohr keeps a record of all men wanted for check passing and each week issues a bulletin to all Santa Rosa stores describing the wanted men and their method of operation. The result is that many a paperhanger has walked into a Santa Rosa business establishment with the idea of exchanging his rubber currency for good American dollars and walked out wearing a pair of steel bracelets and a surprised look on his face.

Businessmen who deposit large sums of money in the local banks are always escorted to their destination by a Santa Rosa policeman and house checks are made by Chief Flohr's men on the homes of all persons who notify the department they are going on vacation.

Two loudspeakers mounted on traffic cars are used by Chief Flohr's men to chide absent-minded drivers and pedestrians and to control unruly crowds. The chief points out that these cars can also be used in case of a civil defense emergency or general disaster of any sort within the city.

During recent years major crime has been held to a minimum in Santa Rosa. There have been some burglaries and safe jobs, the majority of which have been solved. One murder, a baffling affair with both clues and motive lacking, is still unsolved, but all similar cases have been quickly cleared up.

All told, Chief Flohr and his men have done an outstanding job of keeping the streets and buildings of Santa Rosa safe and have contributed much toward making Sonoma county's largest city a safe place to live.

GOWAB

Everyone who drives should remember the memory-assisting or mnemonic term "GOWAB." It is coined from the first letters of the words Gasoline, Oil, Water, Air and Battery. Insist that all of these be checked each time you buy gasoline, says the California State Automobile Association, and don't slight any of them. This thorough and consistent checking will keep your car running in tip-top condition longer and more economically.

GATEWAY TO THE RIVER

John A. Ellis, a veteran Sonoma County peace officer, who has been chief of the Sebastopol Police Department for the past seven years, has found that traffic and transient labor are the two chief problems in policing the little city which sits at the gateway of the Russian River resort area.

While the chief points to traffic as traffic to the resort area created an almost insurmountable problem for Chief Ellis and his men. Almost all of the San Francisco Bay area passes along Main Street, right through the center of Sebastopol.

Bodega Avenue, the other main artery running through the city, was rendered almost useless each weekend the intersection has eliminated the problem. Now, although weekend traffic still backs up from one end of the town to the other, Bodega Avenue can be crossed on busy weekends without police supervision.

With three thousand persons living in the city limits and another three thousand living in the area immediately the big problem in Sonoma County, he has reason to be proud of the town's traffic safety record since he has taken office. For a two-year period there was not a fatal accident within the city limits in spite of the fact that each summer weekend an overflow crowd traveling to and from the Russian River resorts jam the streets of Sebastopol.

Until recently the weekly flow of by the steady flow toward the resort area along Main Street. Inasmuch as Sebastopol was built around the intersection of Bodega and Main, business just about came to a stop in the little city on weekends. Chief Ellis' department was kept constantly busy in an attempt to regulate traffic at the intersection.

The installation of a traffic light at surrounding Sebastopol, the town is a scene of constant activity. Like many California towns this activity steps up about 1,000 percent during the harvest season. Transient labor moves in and Chief Ellis' problems start.

The Chief says most of the itinerant laborers are solid citizens, but always in a flowing population, there are a

CONTROL IN CLOVERDALE

Up in the tall timber country where Chief J. Grant Carnegie presides over the Cloverdale Police Department, revelry, carried to excess, is an expensive proposition.

"We make raising Cain on Saturday night an unprofitable venture," Chief Carnegie explains. "It costs $15 to get so drunk you cannot handle yourself in this town. We do not have 'released when sober' drunks. And if a man decides he can take on the police department we charge him for that privilege also. It costs him $100 to test his manpower against ours in addition to losing the argument. The result is a peaceful city."

There is a reason for Chief Carnegie's hard-handed attitude toward overexuberant revelers. The chief will tell you that some lumberjacks and loggers are rough and rugged characters, particularly on Saturday night. Not only are they rough and rugged, but they take a pride and delight in having the reputation of being tough men who make their living in a tough trade.

A lot of loggers and lumberjacks crowd the streets of Cloverdale on Saturday night, but they are surprisingly orderly. Chief Carnegie and his four-man police department see to it that they are.

Cloverdale, the northernmost town in Sonoma County, is peculiarly enough, known as much for its annual Citrus Fair as for its lumber and related industries. Each year thousands of people flock to the thriving community to attend the festival which pays homage to the nearby citrus groves. Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, Earl Warren, attended the sessions regularly when he was Governor of California.

In addition to citrus fruit and lumber, a variety of other industries thrive around Cloverdale. Among these are some of California's finest vineyards, wineries and stock ranches. The lumber industry supports many saw mills, including one of the nation's largest plywood mills.

Cloverdale claims a population of 1600 with another 1600 living outside the city limits. The little city is beautifully located along the Redwood highway and consists of well-kept, modern homes, buildings and tree-shaded yards.

Chief Carnegie was born in Canada in 1902 and came to the United States at the age of 13. His family settled in Healdsburg and the Chief has lived in Sonoma County ever since. He finished his education in Healdsburg and, partly because he had shown a natural interest in law enforcement ever since he was a small boy, he became a member of the Healdsburg Police Department in 1933. Carnegie was elevated to the position of Chief after a few years service and has served in that capacity through two city administrators. Later, like many Sonoma County Peace Officers, he left the Healdsburg Police Department to serve a two-year term as a deputy in the Sonoma County Sheriff's office. Nine years ago he accepted the position of Chief of Police of Cloverdale and has handled the job in an admirable manner ever since.

CHIEF CARNEGIE

Chief Carnegie is married and is the father of two children, a son and a daughter, who are attending Cloverdale schools.

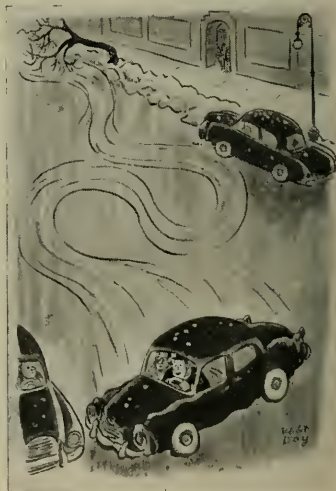

Cloverdale, because of its location on United States Highway 101 is a natural spot to set up roadblocks for the purpose of apprehending escaped prisoners or fleeing criminals. Chief Carnegie has done an outstanding job of handling these blocks and been instrumental in the capture of convicts and criminals fleeing northward.

Recently he received a radio call telling of the escape of four patients in the the Ukiah Hospital for the Criminal Insane. The Chief set up roadblocks on each end of the town immediately and within six minutes after receiving the call had captured all six escapees.

The large amount of traffic which flows along U. S. 101 (which is the main street in the city is a constant headache to the Chief. The steady flow of visiting cars traveling to the northern vacation resorts or to steelhead country in the winter increases the department's traffic problem well beyond that of the average community its size.

Chief Carnegie's department has a three-way radio system which consists of a transmitter at police headquarters, a two-way radio in the police car and a hookup with the Sonoma County Sheriff's department. His radio equipment also connects him with officials in Lake, Napa and Mendocino Counties.

I never use them."

A rear view mirror must be attached so that you can see to the rear of your automobile at least 200 feet, the California State Automobile Association says.

BAKER NOW VETERAN

Jim Baker, the sailor from Chicago Heights, Illinois, who came out to Sonoma with the United States Navy and stayed on to become Chief of Police, is at 30, among the veteran California Police Chiefs.

A lot of changes have taken place in Sonoma since the day in 1946 when Jim the pleasant little city was worth the thirty-minute ride to work each day and moved there.

The principal employer of the local residents in the Sonoma State Hospital with about 1,000 jobs. In addition to this, many light industries in or near Sonoma provide work for from 75 to alcohol.

Last year the Sonoma Police Department, which includes Chief Baker, Patrolmen Joseph Stolz, William Apple and relief man Bernard Shelton, moved from their old quarters in the City Hall to a new building on Patton Street.

The accommodations for law-breakers

Baker decided to live there. Many people who came to the Valley of the Moon had the same idea as Jim and the population of the little town which was built around the Sonoma Mission grew rapidly. Scores of persons who had lived and worked most of their lives in the San Francisco Bay Area came to Sonoma to retire and spend the rest of their lives in the tree-studded hills of the picturesque valley. Hundreds of others, who earn their living in the Navy shipyards at Mare Island, decided that living in Crime in Sonoma is exceptionally light. During the past year felonies have been limited to a minimum and most crime has been restricted to petty theft, such as shoplifting.

A good many traffic citations are distributed by Chief Baker and his men. Their chief problem comes from visiting tourists, up from the bay area for a riotous week-end, who insist on driving their cars while under the influence of Speaking of building projects, Chief Baker has had one of his own this year.

Crime, Crops and Containment

If Al Giorgi, Chief of Police of Healdsburg, follows in the footsteps of his predecessors, some day he'll be a sheriff or hold some similar exalted position . . . or maybe he'll fool the historians and just stay in Healdsburg. All things considered, he's got a good job in a good town.

Chief Giorgi's predecessors as head of the Petaluma Police Department are Melvin Flohr and Harold Patterson—one now the Chief of Police of Santa Rosa and the other Sheriff of Sonoma County.

Al, who was born in Healdsburg May 28, 1910, has had a lot to do with making his native city one noted for its law abiding reputation. Crime—of the major type at least—is scarce in this prosperous little northern Sonoma County community.

Healdsburg, which is a rich little city of about 4,000, shares the problems of a great many other California agricultural communities. Transient labor is as necessary to California farmers as the crops they harvest but sometimes it is as troublesome as a wart on the nose.

Most of the farm hands who come into Healdsburg to relax on Saturday night are orderly, respectable workmen, but there are always a few exceptions. A few are inclined to imbibe too freely and a few more are inclined to react adversely to the liquor. The result is occasional brawls and a capacity crowd of 19 in Healdsburg's four-bed jails on a summer Saturday night.

For the most part the residents of Healdsburg, which is the center of one of California's finest wine producing areas, are unaware of these goings on. An occasional barroom brawl can raise hob with a policeman's evening and not be noticed a block away.

Healdsburg, for the most part, is a peaceful town. The residents there live prosperously as the result of the thriving grape, lumber, fruit and cattle industries which surround the city, and enjoy life in their tree-shaded, pleasant little community.

There is not much crime in the town and for the most part those who commit felonies wind up in the city bastille almost immediately. A good example of Chief Giorgi's fast and efficient police work is the case of the missing mistress which upset the department's normal routine briefly a year ago last summer.

For some time a young lady of questionable reputation had been living with a local laborer as man and wife. The department accepted their story of marital bliss because there was nothing else to do. But when they found the man who posed as her husband lying face down on the bed in a state of rigor mortis wearing a knife at an odd angle in his back, Chief Giorgi and his men did not consider a knife proper wearing apparel, even for a dead man. Subsequent investigation revealed a blood spattered room, a missing "wife" and a missing woman's wardrobe.

Chief Giorgi and his men worked fast. Within an hour they had contacted many of the couple's friends and acquaintances, learned about their habits, plotted a probable course of flight the woman would take and sent out an all-points bulletin describing the fugitive. Less than half a day after they had started the investigation the woman was in the custody of San Mateo County Sheriff's officers and before the day was over she was on her way back to Healdsburg. She is now paying for her crime in a manner prescribed by law and a Sonoma County jury.

The Healdsburg Police Department is equipped with its own two-way radio system and two radio cars which patrol the city on a 24-hour basis. Added to their own radio system is a hookup with the Sonoma County Sheriff's Department in Santa Rosa and an auxiliary power plant to be used in case of a regular power failure.

Traffic on United States Highway 101, which runs through the middle of the little city, was once a problem but two traffic signals installed at the city's busiest intersections have eased the situation considerably.

"There was a time when you could hardly get on the Main Street because of the steady flow of traffic," Giorgi recalls. "But the traffic signals have pretty well solved that problem."

Healdsburg is equipped with parking meters but, according to Chief Giorgi, parking violations are negligible. On the whole the little city is one which presents its chief with a minimum of police problems. There are few burglaries within the city limits and holdups are rare. Healdsburg, like its neighboring community, Cloverdale, is not a location which is attractive to the average holdup man. The escape routes are too few and too easy to block off.

Juvenile crime, a major crime in many cities, is no problem in Healdsburg according to Chief Giorgi. He points out that the youngsters there seem to have enough to interest them without getting into trouble with the law. The chief cooperates with elementary and high school authorities in prevention programs and maintains a firm but understanding enforcement policy.

Chief Giorgi was married in 1937 to Miss Lena Montedonico and the couple have a ten-year-old son, Richard.

FLUSH GEAR HOUSINGS

It is strange that many motorists who would not think of failing to flush the crankcase occasionally, will let the transmission and differential gears go for their entire life without this salutary treatment, points out the National Automobile Club. It is not enough to keep adding lubricant when the supply in these units gets low. Wear fills the grease with filings and eventually it becomes more of a grinding compound than a lubricant.

WHALING STATION

Fields Landing, located in Humboldt County, is reported by the National Automobile Club to be the location of the last active whaling station in the United States.

FERRYBOAT FIREMAN

Melvin Del Maestro, who once held a job which is now extinct in the waters of San Francisco Bay—he was a fireman aboard the San Francisco-Petaluma ferry—has now completed his fourth year as Chief of the Petaluma Police Department.

Del Maestro's sojourn on the bounding main—well, bounding bay anyway—was brief. He joined the Petaluma Police Department in September, 1933 at the age of 29 and since then has dedicated his life to a career of police work.

was appointed to the rank of inspector, a position he held until he was elevated to the chief's job.

To further complete his training as a police executive, Del Maestro was sent to the Federal Bureau of Investigation National Police Academy in 1950 and graduated with the forty-fifth class. He has applied much of what he learned there to the improvement of his department.

He has set up a good bureau of identification, complete with a photographic gallery, a high speed camera and all the best in the state. Major crime is held to a minimum. Burglaries are not numerous and criminal offenses of a lesser nature are well handled by the department. Records show that there are not half a dozen cases of reported felonies unsolved for the past twenty years.

The four miles square area of the city is well patrolled, not only by the department's three-way radio patrol cars, but by foot patrol.

Del Maestro has great faith in foot patrolmen. He believes that in many in-

The Petaluma Police Department as it looked a few months before Del Maestro was appointed Chief. Del Maestro is second from left, front row. Chief Peters is fourth from left.

Chief Del Maestro was born in Humboldt County in 1904. When he was three years old his parents moved to Petaluma and he was raised in the famous western egg center. He graduated from Petaluma High School and went from there to the job of ferryboat fireman.

For nine years after joining the department, Del Maestro was a motorcycle officer. He followed this with four years on prowl car duty. This was followed by a year of work in the office after which he necessary equipment including a darkroom.

After becoming chief, Del Maestro abolished the rank of captain and substituted for it that of deputy chief.

Petaluma, with a population pushing 20,000, is the center of a great poultry area and the eggs and fowl contribute, with a large income from dairying and cattle ranching, to millions of dollars a year to the economy of the city.

Petaluma's law enforcement ranks with stances a man on foot has a better chance to discover criminals in the act of committing their crime than a patrol car crew.

To illustrate his point he points to the night some years ago when a man on the beat broke up two burglaries and brought in the burglars.

Chief Del Maestro was married on March 26, 1926, to Mrs Gladys Martin, a resident of Petaluma. The couple have always been active in community activities and are well known and liked in the town.

Peninsula Policemen

Three of California's most efficient peace officers direct the destinies of the police departments which enforce the law in the prospering communities which meet on the Santa Clara-San Mateo County line on the lower end of the San Francisco peninsula.

SHERIFF WHITMORE

The veteran among these police chiefs is George Potter of Menlo Park who began his police career as a patrolman in 1943 when Menlo Park was a town of about 4,000. Four years after joining the force Potter, then a captain, was appointed Chief and the sleepy little suburban town where he had started work was a bustling little city.

Today Chief Potter directs the department from the most modern and efficient civic center on the peninsula and his men patrol an area where more than 20,000 residents live, shop and conduct their business. The new police headquarters are a far cry from the ancient building where the police department operated when Potter joined the force little more than a decade ago.

A few miles away in Redwood City Chief Stanley Wood, who ranks next to Potter from a standpoint of seniority as a chief among the three, directs the destinies of the Redwood City Police Department. Chief Wood took office October 1, 1950, succeeding Chief C. L. Collins who served that community for 30 years as chief. Like Potter, he found himself in charge of law enforcement in a community which is growing at a rate which is out of all proportion to any normal population expansion.

Chief William A. Hydie, a relative newcomer to the peninsula—he took office late in 1952—is nevertheless an old hand as a Chief of Police. Chief Hydie came to the Palo Alto Police Department from Merced where he had served as chief since 1948. Prior to that Chief Hydie served for nine years as a member of the Albany Police Department.

A career policeman, Chief Hydie is well prepared for his job.

He attended Berkeley High School, The University of California and St. Mary's College. After finishing his college courses he worked for the Standard Oil Company of California before accepting a job with the Albany Department.

Traffic is a major problem for all three peninsula cities, with the jammed El Camino and equally packed, fast moving Bayshore Highway traveling through all three of them.

Palo Alto, with a reputation for firm law enforcement which dates back to the old days of the thirties—when traffic violators had to chop wood for the city whether they could afford to pay a fine or not—had had consistently one of the top safety records in California—and for that matter the nation. This in spite of the brimming Bayshore traffic and one of the meanest and most crowded three way signals in existence.

In Redwood City Chief Wood manages to keep traffic accidents at a minimum in spite of the fact that close to 100,000 cars a day pass through this city which has not yet reached the 40,000 mark in population. A check several years ago at the main crossing streets of main and Broadway revealed that over two thousand cars an hour pass that intersection, yet traffic accidents are held to a minimum.

Traffic is a major problem in Menlo Park and, by means of a continuous patrol through the city by officers on motorcycles and prowler cars, with concentration on the Bayshore, Middlefield Road and the El Camino, Chief Potter and his department have maintained a commendable record in curbing traffic violations and accidents.

One of Potter's cars is equipped with everything necessary for crime detection or accident assistance. A first aid kit and a camera fitted with a fingerprint attachment are among the equipment included in the car.

Crime problems among the three communities are about equal with burglaries in some of the larger foothill estates creating the chief headache. But by maintaining good liaison with Sheriff Earl Whitmore, the three chiefs have managed to maintain an outstanding record of cleared cases and to hold major crime to a minimum.

Item in The Palouse, (Wash.) Republic for Aug. 20, 1954:

"Palouse again has a full-time law enforcement officer with the arrival of H. E. Brazington, who was appointed chief of police by Mayor Hobert Proctor.

"The new police officer was formerly employed in a similar position at Deer Park.

"The new police officer was hired with the understanding that he will take over other duties with the city as well as police work. These will include maintenance work on Main St., painting, weed-cutting, mowing of boulevard strips and other such jobs. In an emergency he would also be expected to help out with any city job.

"At the present he begins work around noon and is taking care of the extra jobs in the afternoon policing during the same hours and at night. Residents are asked to help him observe these hours by making only emergency calls in the morning."

* * *

If there is any janitor work the citizens of Palouse have overlooked for Mr. Brazington they should call a meeting as soon as possible. In a town of a thousand persons in the nation's wealthiest wheat county (Whitman), the duly elected and responsible city fathers hire a police officer in such manner.

* * *

It is time to change the line of reasoning on the part of the public that police work and police officers are within the category of necessary evils and that police work is a relatively unimportant and incidental duty. It is also time to change the line of reasoning on the part of the public that whatever a cop makes is all he is worth. The public can, and should stop this dangerous trend by giving their policemen the opportunity to perform—and insisting upon—good service, and also by paying their policemen well.

SIEGE OF THE CITADEL

But if the talent for such a break existed any place in the world, it was right there on The Rock, in cell block D. Somerly, Cretzer studied his mates.

There was lean, wiry Bernard Paul Coy, middle-aged Kentucky bank robber, serving twenty-five years for a shotgun stickup in 1937. At forty-six, Coy didn't have much chance to finish his sentence alive. He was transferred to Alcatraz because he was too tough for Atlanta, and a lot of tough men were still in the Georgia prison.

Twenty-nine-year-old Miran E. Thompson, who was serving a ninety-nine-year sentence for kidnapping and life for the murder of an Amarillo, Texas, policeman, had a record of eight escapes before he was transferred to Alcatraz from Leavenworth, Kansas, in October, 1945. Eight escapes.

Sam Shockley, a lifer serving sentences for kidnapping and bank robbery had a record of escapes behind him before being transferred to Alcatraz from Leavenworth in May, 1938. Life is a long time for a man thirty-six years old.

After finishing a thirty-year sentence, Marvin Franklin Hubbard would be sixty-four years old. A man couldn't have much fun when he was sixty-four. Hubbard, a Chattanooga, Tennessee, kidnapper, was transferred to Alcatraz in December, 1944, after participating in a mutiny at Atlanta. He escaped from prison three times.

The kid-nineteen-year-old Clarence Carnes, Oklahoma kidnapper and murderer, serving ninety-nine years, started early on his trip to Alcatraz, but not until he had escaped from the Oklahoma City jail. There was a lot on the outside for a kid like Carnes.

Louis Fleisher, toughest and smartest of the lot, was imprisoned in cell block D. As leader of the notorious "Purple Gang," Fleisher had terrorized Detroit, Michigan, during the early 1930's. After many arrests on charges of operating prohibition era rackets, bank robberies, and safe crackings, he was convicted of possessing unregistered machine guns and recently transferred to Alcatraz. Fleisher could teach them all something.

Rufus "Whitey" Franklin, killer of Cline in the 1938 escape attempt, was still there. Franklin, with his vast knowledge of The Rock's layout, and virtuosity with locks and bars, would add strength to any man's escape attempt. And the guard killer had little to lose. Serving life, in addition to other charges, for the killing of one of his keepers, had not made the prisoner's lot an easy one.

Then there was himself. Joseph Paul "Dutch Joe" Cretzer, master bank robber. For twelve years he and his gang had robbed banks without detection. Federal agents had known his technique by heart, but had never been able to locate the gang. It was not until he "retired" and his gang pulled a job without him that they caught up with him. Even then he escaped from McNeil Island. He was sent to Alcatraz when he killed a United States Marshal while standing trial at Tacoma, Wash. Handcuffed, he had clubbed the marshal over the head in a last desperate try for freedom.

It was in Seattle that Cretzer had issued his warning to Detective Captain Richard Mahoney. He remembered that talk and his promise to the policeman.

"Send me anywhere," he had pleaded, "but don't send me to Alcatraz. I was raised in San Francisco. It's my town. I love it. From The Rock I'll be able to see the lights go on in the evening. All day I'll know it's there, less than a mile away. Market Street, the Mission, Broadway, and the North Beach. I can't take that."

But it was no use. The court had said Alcatraz. "I'll get out," he had screamed. "I'll either get out or I'll get killed trying." Then he added, threateningly: "And I won't die alone, either!" His thoughts wandered back to his fellow inmates. Take Coy, for instance. Coy was a trusty. During the day he could wander almost at will up and down the cell block. The thought pounded through his brain. Escape. He had to do it. Beyond those bars and across a narrow strip of water was the city of San Francisco. Joseph Paul Cretzer, bank robber, murderer, and master planner, wanted to go to town.

At two o'clock on the afternoon of May 2, 1945, guard Bert A. Burch was in the west gallery, a barred walk that ran along the length of the cell house wall. It was in this double decked pathway that the armed guards patrolled the prison, protected from attacks by the inmates by bars, eighteen by five inches apart. To avoid possible breaks, no guard was allowed to enter the cell blocks while carrying arms other than clubs or gas billies. The gun gallery was entered only through double doors on the outside. It was foolproof and tamper proof.

In Cell block D, Bernard Paul Coy waited nervously until the guard was out of sight. Then, from the far end of the cell block, he climbed, catlike, up the barred catwalk. Once on top he reached nervously into his uniform. Quickly he inserted a long, pipe-like object between the bars and started work with a pair of pliers.

In a moment the bars were spread apart far enough for the lithe little man to force his way into the gun gallery. Taking his home-made bar spreader with him, he dropped to the catwalk and stalked silently toward the west gallery. At its entrance he fell to the floor and waited, scarcely daring to breathe. He could hear the heavy tread of the guard approaching. When he was less than three feet away, Coy lunged forward, bringing his heavy tool crashing against the skull of Burch with all the hate and fury years of lawlessness had stored in his oversized body.

Guard Burch never had a chance. Trouble in the cell blocks was to be expected. Trouble in the gun gallery was impossible. Yet, suddenly it was on him in the form of a cat-like little man intent on crushing him with a blunt, heavy instrument. He slumped to the floor and lost consciousness while the freedom-crazed convict beat wildly against his skull.

Satisfied at last that Burch could offer no resistance, Coy tied the unconscious guard's arms behind his back and stripped him of his rifle, pistol and uniform, then reached for the most vital object, the keys. The bank robber then took time to secure fifty rounds of ammunition, more for the guard's automatic pistol, a dozen gas billies, clubs, gas masks, and the guard's key box. Then he retraced his path to the point where he had spread the bars, climbed through the narrow aperture, dropped to the cell house floor, and the three-day siege of Alcatraz Island was on.

With the keys he had secured from Burch, Coy freed Cretzer, Thompson, Hubbard, Shockley, Carnes, and many other prisoners. The majority, however, shook their heads.

"You'll never make it," they predicted, and stayed in their cells, the safest place they could sweat out the battle that was sure to come. Among these was Louis Fleisher.

Warnings from their fellow prisoners meant nothing to Cretzer and Coy, however. Cretzer, armed with Burch's revolver, lead the way through the cell blocks to the cell of Rufus "Whitey" Franklin. They found a special lock on the door of his cell. Savagely, Cretzer turned to his companions.

"Get the guards. We've got to get him out," he ordered.

Striking swiftly and silently, the convicts began their assault on the unarmed guard working within the cell block. One by one they lead Captain Henry H. Weinhold, Lieutenant Joseph Simpson, and Officers William H. Miller, Robert R. Baker, Joseph Burdette, and Robert C. Bristow into cell block D. There the guards were imprisoned in the cells recently occupied by the convicts. The plan was working smoothly. Cretzer and his gang returned to Franklin's cell.

Frantically they worked to open the door. But, in spite of the imprisoned killer's instructions, they were unable to solve the mystery of the double-locked door that could only be opened by an electrically controlled switch in the gun gallery where Officer Burch lay, beaten and bleeding.

Completely frustrated, Cretzer turned from the cell and swore violently. "That's it," he told Coy. "Frisco is just as far away as ever." He lead the way back to the kitchen, opened the door with keys captured from the hostage guards, and opened fire on the unsuspecting armed guard in a tower which stood athwart the escape path.

He missed. One shot was all he got, and once he had fired, any chance for the convicts to add to their small arsenal was destroyed. Immediately the tower guard picked up a telephone and relayed the alarm to Warden James A. Johnston. The warden was eating lunch when he received the call.

"There's trouble in the cell block," he heard the voice say. "I don't know what it is, but I think it's serious."

"Kick the siren if you think it is serious," Johnston answered. Then he rushed from his home to the scene of action.

Meanwhile Associate Warden E. J. Miller heard the shot and a guard shout: "Someone's on the loose with a gun in the cell block," and rushed up to the scene of trouble. He was followed by guards armed only with gas billies and clubs. As he ran forward he noticed an officer with a gun, and realized that this was out of order. No armed guard was allowed into the cell block. He looked closer, saw that it was the convict, Coy, and raised his gas billy. As he did so, Coy swore violently.

"I'll get you, Meathead." He raised his gun and fired before Miller had any chance to swing the billy. The bullet exploded the gas billy out of the assistant warden's hand as he held it ready beside his face. Blinded, Miller retreated. As he stumbled from the cell block he was met by Warden Johnston.

"They've got control in there," he reported. "I don't know how many are armed, or how heavily."

"Try the West Gallery," Johnston ordered.

A guard picked up the prison telephone and tried to call Burch. After several minutes he gave up. "There's no answer," he told the warden.

Inside the cell house, Cretzer and his pals turned back to cell block D, and their hostages. "Maybe we can get the keys and shoot our way out," Cretzer suggested. "At least we can try."

They came to Carl W. Sundstrom, the prison record clerk, first. "Take off your clothes," the convict ordered. While the guard stripped, his wallet fell out and was picked up by Cretzer. The erstwhile bank robber laughed as he took ninety-two dollars from it. "You can call this highway robbery if you want to," he chuckled. Then he turned to Simpson. Without warning he fired two shots, hitting the helpless guard in the stomach and chest. The maddened criminal was swearing viciously and laughing at the same time. "I'm going to kill you. I'm going to kill every one of you," he roared.

While his mates looked on, Cretzer fired two more shots, hitting Officer Baker in both legs. The three guards lay very still on the floor, feigning death. Cautiously, Sundstrom found a pencil and a scrap of paper and wrote a note. It said:

"Cretzer killed or shot Simpson in the stomach and chest and shot Baker also. He missed me so far. I think he will kill us all. Sundstrom."

Coy interrupted the intended massacre. "Don't kill them all," he warned. "We can hold them for hostages."

"Don't make me laugh harder," Cretzer retorted. "We aren't going to make any agreements. We want the keys and we're going to get them. Then we ought to kill them all. We don't want any witnesses." He turned to Officer Miller. "Strip," he demanded. Miller shook his head. Cretzer swore and hurled the guard to a bench in a cell. "I said strip!" he shouted.

Miran Thompson grabbed the rifle from Coy and swung it toward the guard. "Let me shoot him. I'll put him out of his misery."

"Wait," Cretzer ordered. "Give the gun back to Coy." Then he turned his attention back to Miller. "Get those clothes off."

Miller shook his head. "You can go straight to hell."

With his fists and his feet Cretzer attacked the guard. He pummeled him mercilessly, knocked him down, and jumped on his chest and stomach. "You've got the keys, you Give them to me." Still Miller held out. Cretzer continued his beating. Are you going to give me those keys?" Finally the guard could stand no more. He nodded his head. Cretzer jerked him to his feet and dropped him on the bench. Miller reached into his pocket and withdrew the keys, then, while Cretzer studied them, made a quick motion. The convicts heard the ring of metal against concrete. They turned and saw, far in the rear of an electrically locked cell, the shining bit of brass. It was the key to the back door. The only chance for freedom.

For a few moments the convicts turned and tried desperately to enter the cell. It was no use. The cell was like Franklin's and could only be opened from the gun gallery. Coy ran for a rubber squeegee he had been working with earlier in the day, but it was ineffective. He could not reach the vital piece of metal. Back in his own cell, Miller grinned weakly. Savagely, Cretzer turned on him. He held the automatic against the battered guard's chest. He was wild with rage and frustration.

"So you think you're funny. Is this funny?" He jammed the gun against the guard's chest and pulled the trigger. There was a dull snapping sound of the hammer coming to rest against the empty chamber. The convict laughed insanely as he pulled the empty clip from his gun and snapped a fresh one into place. Still laughing he pulled the trigger twice and Miller, fatally wounded sagged to the floor. This time there was no stopping the crazed felon. He emptied his gun, wounding Captain Weinhold and Officers Joseph Burdette and Robert C. Bristov. Knowing that their lives depended upon their ability to play dead successfully, the wounded men lay very still. Only Sundstrom was uninjured. Somehow Cretzer forgot him during his wild rage.

Meanwhile, outside the cell house, Warden Johnston organized a party to enter the embattled cell house and end the mutiny. Harold P. Stites, hero of the 1938 break attempt, volunteered to head the mission. Behind him were Harry Cochran, Herschel R. Oldham, Clark, Lieutenant Johnson, Lieutenant Bergan, and Assistant Warden Miller. Cautiously Stites approached the cell house door and opened it. For a moment he stood silhouetted against the cell house door. He was less than thirty feet away from the convicts. They had taken up a position along the first row of cells in D block, just above a narrow steel ladder, the only approach to the block. From this vantage point their position was concealed, yet unassailable. As Stites started forward two shots rang out. The guard slumped to the floor, shot through the kidneys.

While the guards behind him laid down a heavy curtain of fire, Oldham entered the cell block, but before he had a chance was hit by the deadly fire of the convicts. Next, Cochran entered the block, only to meet the same fate.

The three guards were rescued from the cell block by their companions under heavy fire, and for the moment all further attempts to enter the cell block were abandoned. A short time before the warden had sent his first dramatic message, via telegram, to the mainland. It said:

"Serious trouble has broken out. A convict has a machine gun in the cell house. I have issued a riot call and placed armed guards at strategic locations. Several of our officers are imprisoned in the cell house. I cannot tell the extent of injuries suffered by our officers or the amount of damages done."

At the same time, Johnston appealed for aid from the Army, Navy, and San Francisco Police Department. Immediately Coast Guard boats were sent to patrol the edge of the island in case the convicts should break into the open and lead a mass escape into the heavily populated San Francisco bay area. The San Francisco police boat, D. A. White, stood by off shore, waiting orders from Warden Johnston to land. In addition to her regular crew, the police boat was manned by twenty picked men, headed by Captain of Inspectors Bernard J. McDonald.

At 4:45 p.m. Marine Gunner Charles L. Buckner, predestined to find himself among the heroes of The Rock, received orders to stand by for further orders by the Twelfth Naval District command. Gunner Buckner ordered all of his men to remain in their quarters so that he could have thirty men ready to respond to the riot call from Alcatraz.

Meanwhile thousands of San Franciscans lined up on the fashionable Marina and watched the dramatic scene that was unfolding in front of the city. Chief of Police Charles Dullea was forced to dispatch special squads of policemen to handle traffic in the heavily congested area. More crowds gathered at vantage points on Telegraph Hill, and Pacific Heights.

Back at Treasure Island, Gunner Buckner was ordered to prepare to embark immediately for Alcatraz with thirty volunteers. He ordered his company to fall out and asked for thirty volunteers, and got a hundred and sixty. The curious and combat hungry Marines had to be restrained with threats of severe discipline. Shortly after, when the Gunner embarked aboard a Navy P. C. boat, he discovered that in addition to the thirty men he had picked, three men had managed to smuggle themselves on the boat.

Following his orders to stand by until he was ordered to land, Buckner cruised off the island for forty minutes. The Marines, hearing the sounds of battle on the nearby island, stirred restlessly and battered their commander with questions. Finally the Warden's boat came from the island, and took the Marines aboard with the explanation that the pier was too shallow for a landing by the P. C. boat. Buckner left ten reserves aboard the Navy boat and took the remaining twenty-three to the island. The mutiny on Alcatraz was assuming the proportions of a small war.

On the dock Buckner was met by Assistant Warden Miller, to whom the Marine latter referred as the "Hero of the Rock". Miller took the Gunner and his men to a wall surrounding the yard where they would be out of the rioting convicts' fire and acquainted the Marine Officer with the situation to date and pointed out the possible lanes of fire.

"We want you and your men to stand guard over the prisoners who are now in the work shops until the uprising is over," Miller explained. "We can't leave them in the work shops and we can't let the outbreak spread, so we'll have to herd them into the prison yard until the war is over."

Buckner nodded grimly and stationed his men at vantage points around the wall. Miller began to release prisoners from the lower level work shop. They came out slowly and sullenly, cursing and snarling at their green uniformed guards. The battle hardened Marines stood ready for trouble, and watched somewhat in awe as one hundred and eighty-three of the nation's toughest convicts were lead past them. The convicts muttered angrily and at times had to be forced forward at the point of a gun.

As soon as his Marines were posted and all of the convicts not in the cell house were in the yard, Buckner left a corporal, his only non-commissioned officer, in charge, and went to the Warden's office where Johnston was directing the hassle. He noticed that all of the fire from the cell windows was small arms fire, and that most of it came from the windows of cell block D. Guards were crouching along the catwalk, firing into the windows blindly, apparently to force the embattled prisoners to keep their heads down. The puzzled Marine entered the Warden's office with a question. "We came over here to clean this thing out and we were put on guard duty, sir," Buckner said. "Why?"

"We need someone to guard the prisoners and couldn't think of any group of men available in a hurry who were better qualified," Johnston stated. "At the same time, I feel that this break is the responsibility of the guards here and do not believe I am qualified to risk the lives of men who have already done that sort of thing too often. Your boys risked their lives overseas. There's no need for it here."

Back at his post on the stockade wall, the warrant officer could see that the guards were shooting tracer bullets from their rifles, using them to illuminate the interior of the darkened prison. About 11:30 p.m., Miller approached the Gunner and told him he was going to lead an expedition to rescue the guards being held hostage.

Miller said that two guards, R. E. Sutter and E. B. Lageson, had received slight wounds while attempting to gain entrance to the gun gallery where Burch was trapped. He added that they had managed to reach Burch, and after several attempts, been able to place a large steel plate between the guard and the rioting convicts that would provide ample protection from their bullets.

Shortly after being slugged by Coy, Burch had regained consciousness, and using the thin steel moulding that rimmed the catwalk of the west gallery for cover, had worked his way worm-like to a stand supporting one of the prison telephones. For several minutes he lay listening, waiting for the attention of the convicts to be taken from the gallery, then, brought himself up to his knees and knocked the phone to the catwalk. From that position he had managed to give Warden Johnston some information as to what was taking place within the cell block.

Later in the evening Johnston had been able to send his men into the gun gallery with a thick steel plate and rearm the stranded guard. Prior to that time, any one of the blood-thirsty felons who cared to and was able to locate him could have sent a bullet through the catwalk and ended Burch's life.

At 11:30 p.m. on Thursday, Miller lead his guards into the embattled cell block D. They moved slowly under the cover of darkness and a heavy curtain of fire from the other guards. At the assistant warden's instructions, Buckner stood in the visiting block and watched the rescue through bullet-proof glass. Standing close against the windows he could see the guards' dim figures filter through the doorway and crawl slowly toward the trouble.

While a single armed guard stood by the cell house door, one of his mates, armed only with a club, would crawl down the service corridor toward the hostage guards, feeling his way with touch and hearing through the heavy blackness.

First unarmed guard to enter the corridor was Cecil D. Corwin. Buckner saw the door open and Corwin's dim figure slide through the narrow aperture and disappear in the darkness. As the guard passed nearby, he could hear his heavy breathing through the amplifier, used ordinarily as a speaking tube by visitors. The sound grew fainter as the guard passed on.

Then, as clearly as if he were standing in the room, Buckner heard the sharp clang of metal, a muffled groan, followed by a staccato series of oaths from the cell block. A shot echoed through the cell block, then another. For a moment silence reigned. Then the Gunner heard the stealthy breathing of a second guard passing by the amplifier. He waited breathlessly until the sound returned, this time heavier and labored, and accompanied by a rasping sort of snore.

The door to the darkened visitors' block opened and Buckner leaped to the assistance of the two guards who entered carrying a stretcher. He helped them carry their burden across the room to the doctor's office. There he saw that the bleeding man was Corwin. Blood was flowing freely from a wound in his head and he was unconscious. The Marine cursed softly under his breath and returned to his post by the window.

Once again he saw the figure flit through the doorway, and heard the phantom breathing going along and returning in the company of another wounded man. This time he could hear angry curses mixed with the moaning as he helped the guards carry their wounded mate into the doctor's office. One of them told him the injured man was W. H. Miller. He stood by watching while the doctor ripped open Miller's shirt.

Two small holes, both crusted with blood, were uncovered when the crimson garment was removed, one in the chest and the other in the abdomen. Beneath them the guard was bloated to almost three times his normal size and black with contusions. He listened bitterly while Miller gasped out his story.

"It was Cretzer," he moaned. "I had the keys and he wanted them." The injured man paused and, for the moment, seemed to drift off into eternity. The doctor leaned closer.

"Go on," he requested, "What happened next?"

"I . . . I held out as long as I could, then I let him have them." Miller's words came slowly, painfully. "He jumped on my chest. He knocked me down and jumped up and down on my chest and kicked me. I couldn't do anything. While I tried to resist he slugged me with a gun."

A tiny trickle of blood flowed from the corner of the wounded man's mouth. He coughed and the air was filled with fine crimson spray. Then he continued. "I threw the key to the back gate into one of the electrically locked cells. They couldn't get it. Then Cretzer went completely out of his mind. He jammed the gun against my stomach and pulled the trigger. The clip was empty. He said he was sorry and laughed and put in a new clip and pulled the trigger again. This time he got me. He roared with laughter and shot me a second time. Then he kept pulling the trigger and hitting the other men."

The little ball of hate and rage that had found its way into the Marine's mind was growing to uncontrollable proportions while he watched Associate Warden Miller approach his name-sake with a pencil and pad of paper in hand.

"Do you think you can dictate a statement?" he asked gently. The wounded man nodded his head, then dictated the following:

"Being in a critical condition and believing that I am now dying, I make this my sworn statement that I was shot with a .45 caliber Colt revolver by Convict Joseph Cretzer, No. 548, whom I can positively identify.

"Joseph Cretzer shot me cold-bloodedly and said: 'I will kill you.' Cretzer shot me when I was in a cell in which he and the other prisoners had placed me."

Laboriously, the wounded man scrawled his uncertain signature across the bottom of the statement. Buckner returned to his post by the visitors' window. Schemes for ending the bloody rebellion pounded through his brain. He remembered the day of November 1, 1945, when he had stepped into a landing craft and watched the dive bombers and torpedo bombers from the old "Sister Sara," while his flat-bottomed boat found its place in formation and pounded for shore.

He had gone in with the Third Tank battalion, attached to the Third Division, and landed on Torkina point. The jungle smothered Jap seventy-sevens sent defiantly from the Bougainville beach head and from the moment the division set foot on the marshy surface of the island, he had seen little besides blood and suffering and more blood. He remembered hulking, two hundred and fifty pound Captain Warner, who had served in Japan as a military attache, and how the Captain had shouted orders to the enemy in their own language, and by so doing had drawn them into a lethal trap. And he remembered how the Captain's plan had finally backfired and he took two slugs just above the knee, and how his lips drained free of blood and his forehead was covered with the cold, beady sweat of agony, while they dragged him to safety. And while his mind wandered he could hear the ghost-like breathing of the creeping guards in the service corridor and the soft moaning curses behind him. And while he watched, the kinship that one man who has faced death feels for his fellow soldiers welled up and pushed itself into a lump at his throat. He moved grimly to the door to admit another victim.

The latest was Lieutenant Simpson, shot twice in the stomach, and hovering over the border of death. The wounded officer punctuated his moans with muttered curses, while Buckner lead the way to the doctor's office. The Marine thought about the pill boxes on Guam and the Japs that had not seen them come or go on Chichi Jima. On Bougainville there had been dirt pill boxes braced by coconut logs fifteen feet thick. They had been cleaned out in 24 hours, but not without casualties. This prison couldn't be tougher. The thought kept coursing through his mind. This place could be beaten.

Still the unarmed guards worked their way along the service corridor, returning with their pain-laden cargoes. Another one, Fred J. Richberger, was hit, but returned with a wounded comrade at his side.

Captain Weinhold emerged from the battle ground, carrying two bullets through his chest and one through his left arm. Buckner could see that the captain was in agony and going deep into shock. The guard looked at him and spoke, half in delirium: "So the Marines have landed. I guess we haven't got anything to worry about now."

The Warrant Officer winced. He glanced around him and saw that the last of the guards had been brought in from the cell block. For a short time he occupied himself with the removal of the injured men from the island. Then he returned to Warden Johnston's office. A cold rage was working its way to the surface. He faced the island's field general.

"I've been thinking, Warden," he said, "and I believe that I could be of some assistance in getting those guys out. Hand grenades ought to work. Or maybe a bazooka would do the job. But there must be some way we can route them out. I've seen this kind of action, lots of it, and I think I know more about the kind of weapons needed than the average guard."

"All right, Gunner," the Warden responded. "It's against my principles, but I'll give you a chance. We're not getting anywhere, the way things are going."

Accompanied by the Assistant Warden Miller, Gunner Buckner started for the cell block. The prison official was carrying a handful of small red flares.

"We'll go to the cell block and shoot these things off inside. They're not much as flares go, but they ought to give you enough light to look over the situation inside," Miller told him. "I think you ought to see how things are before you make any plans."

"That's fair enough," Buckner replied. "Where did you get those flares, incidentally? I've never seen any like them. Are they standard here?"

Miller smiled. "Not exactly. They washed ashore one day and I stored them away. I never dreamed they'd come in handy, but it seemed a shame just to throw them away."

They stopped talking as they drew near the cell house and crouched outside. Miller lit one of the flares and tossed it in the cell block. From the end of the service corridor, the Marine caught a brief glimpse of the interior and judged it to be about 80 feet long. A second flare revealed that three tiers of cells rose along the service corridor, which house nothing but a maze of pipes and a narrow catwalk.

"Do you see that ladder?" Miller wanted to know, after lighting up a third flare. Buckner nodded, then ducked when a brief fusillade of bullets roared from the interior of the cell house. Miller hugged the ground beside him and continued. "That ladder is the only approach to the first tier of cells. The cons are just above it. Anybody who pokes his head above the platform will get it blown off. The same holds true for almost anyone who uses the service corridor."

The firing subsided and the assistant warden lit another flare. For a flickering moment, Buckner stared at the narrow service corridor and the ladder. He judged the aisle to be about four feet wide, with the ladder at the far end. From their vantage point on the first tier, the rioting convicts commanded every available entrance to the cell block, meanwhile remaining invisible themselves.

"Maybe we could use grenades," Miller suggested.

"Maybe," he Marine agreed. "How wide are the bars on the cell doors separated. It will make a difference."

"About four by eight inches," the official told him.

Buckner shook his head. "Then grenades are out. I thought that we might be able to toss a few fragmentation hand grenades into the cells. If we could get them inside, exploding at close range, we could tear them to pieces. But we could never get a grenade through those bars. For every one that gets through, a hundred might ricochet, and there is nothing more dangerous than a grenade that bounces."

"Could you use mortars then?" Miller wanted to know. Once again Gunner Buckner shook his head and explained:

"Lou Diamond couldn't drop a mortar shell into this cell block from the edge of the island," the Marine stated. "The path of trajectory of a mortar is long range, and much too high for accurate work in a case like this. I'd shoot clear over the island, and wouldn't be able to help it."

"What about a bazooka, then?"

"That might do it," Buckner admitted. "But they're awfully high velocity and destructive. I'd rather wait with them. But there must be some way."

For a moment they were silent. The firing had stopped and darkness pressed around them. Then Miller's face brightened. "I've got it," he declared. "We can bore holes through the roof of the cell block and drop hand grenades straight down. They can't bounce back up."

"That's right," Buckner agreed. "But what good would they do? Probably about 75 percent of them would fall into the service corridor below the cons. That sounds sort of useless."

Miller's face darkened. "You think of everything. It's too bad, but I guess you're right. How about holding them and waiting for the fuse to burn short?"

"No. Some of them have a short fuse to begin with. If a five-second fuse burns three, you might get your hand blown off." He paused and pondered. "But you've got something there. There must be some way to get those grenades to explode where we want them."

The pair turned and headed back toward the warden's office. Behind them the sounds of battle flared up briefly. Glancing back they could see tracer bullets tearing into the besieged cell block and tracing crazy patterns as they ricocheted from wall to wall behind the barred windows. Finally, the Marine spoke.

"I think I've got it. Let's get the holes bored. And while we're at it, it might be a good idea to send for some anti-tank rifle grenades. An ordinary rifle grenade would be just as likely to ricochet as the little ones, but the anti-tank weapons burst on impact. They make shrapnel of anything they hit."

"We'll get them, but we'll have to wait for daylight to drill the holes, so we can pick the right spots," Miller told him. "In the meantime, what's your idea?"

"It's simple. All I need is some string. A hand grenade is set off by a fuse that is ignited by a cap similar to one used in the shell of a bullet. When the pin is pulled and the lever released, a striker, similar to the hammer and firing pin of a rifle, hits the cap and explodes a small charge of powder, which, in turn, ignites the fuse and eventually sets off the black powder that makes the grenade effective."

"If I tie string around the grenade and cut it at the proper length, pull the pin, and drop the grenade, it will fall to the end of the string, hang there, and then burst in midair like an anti-aircraft shell. It's effectiveness will be increased because shrapnel will fly in four directions."

Miller nodded admiringly. "Somewhere, there is a touch of genius in that idea," he observed. "Let's take it to Warden Johnston."

Johnston promptly approved the project and at five a.m., on May 3, work was started drilling holes into the roof of the cell house. The plan was to have the Gunner move from hole to hole at irregular intervals so that no section of the block would be safe.

At 5:30 a.m., Buckner pulled the pin of the first grenade and dropped it through the freshly drilled hole. The string, which should have pulled taut, hung limp in his hand. Miller stared. "It must have caught in the screen under the roof."

"I see it," Buckner gasped, lunging toward the hole. "Get out of here." His hand shot down the hole, and with a quick, twisting movement, he freed the grenade and dropped it clear, twisting himself away from the hole as he did so. Immediately the deadly missile roared below them.

For a moment Buckner lay still, his eyes closed and his body trembling. His tropical tan had faded to an ashen gray. Finally he sat up and glanced at Miller.

"I thought that was it. Believe me, I've looked at the old man with the scythe before, but this time I could feel his breath."

"Why didn't you run?" Miller wanted to know.

"I never could have made it," Buckner replied. "When I reached for that grenade I only had about two seconds left." He grinned. "Well, I made it. This time I'll have to be more careful," he added, pulling the pin of a second grenade and working it past the wire before he released the lever and dropped it. This time he was comfortably away from the hole when the charge exploded below.

Grimly Buckner clung to his task, working up and down the utility corridor running through blocks C and D. After more than a dozen grenades had been exploded, guards watching the outside reported a white cloth showing in the cell house. Warden Johnston hurried to the scene. For the moment all firing ceased, but the truce was short-lived.

"We want to make a deal," a voice shouted from the cell block.

"Throw out your guns and ammunition," ordered Johnston. "That is the only kind of a deal we'll make."

His answer was a bullet singing close by. Gunner Buckner resumed his bombardment. With each shell he dropped, a pistol shot aimed at his exposed hand answered. Because of the threat from the convict's bullets the Warrant Officer ripped the skin raw on his right arm as he jerked it away from danger through the cell house screen. As the attack wore on, it became apparent that the besieged convicts had found cover. Buckner paused.

"Those rifle grenades have arrived," Miller reported. "Do you want to try your hand at those?"

Buckner nodded and the group retired from the roof. The new weapons were waiting in the Warden's office. "We'll have to take them to the beach," the Marine stated. "These things were meant to be used at long range."

Miller pointed out desirable windows for the Gunner to use as a target, and because of their nature the Marine was forced to pick an exposed position. He studied the situation briefly.

"I'm afraid to use a Garand," he stated. "The range is too short, and I'll probably shoot clear across the island. I don't know how high the trajectory of these things is." He fitted a grenade on the end of his six-pound gun and fired. Because of his exposed position he was forced to lie prone and shoot, and his body jerked convulsively as it absorbed the full shock of the heavy missile. The grenade skittered through the grass and came to rest close to the prison wall. Nothing happened.

"Why didn't it explode?" Miller wanted to know.

"I didn't pull the pin," Buckner replied. "I never knew if a carbine would fire one of those things successfully. Now I know it won't. I might have killed someone if I had pulled the pin. I'll have to have a Garand."

A guard took the Gunner's carbine to the Marines on duty in the stockade and returned with a private's rifle. Once again Buckner fitted the missile to his gun and fired. The projectile described a high arc and landed high and to the left of the target window. Buckner moved his sights and fired a second grenade. It hit dead center, but exploded on contact with the bars. A third, and then a fourth were fired before the bars folded back like curled spaghetti and the deadly missiles exploded inside the cell block. Once again a white cloth appeared.

"We want to surrender," came the voice from the cell block.

"Where are your guns?" Johnston asked. Once again his answer was a burst of gunfire. Buckner resumed his shelling. As each projectile left his gun, his prone body jerked back in the sand. Rifle fire, at intervals, raked the air over his head. As the day wore on the Marine's face took on a ruddy glow and turned almost purple as the firing progressed. Thirty shells were fired, and the Marine clung stubbornly to his task. Forty, and the answering fire from the cell block diminished. Only two of the forty shells had failed to strike the window. One of these Buckner had deliberately misplaced in an effort to smash in the wall. After firing the fiftieth shell, a thin stream of blood began to trickle from the Marine's nostrils. The dark, sweaty splotch where the rifle butt rested against his khaki shirt took on a pinkish hue. After firing his sixtieth grenade, Buckner laid his rifle aside. He had not had any answering fire for some time. Darkness was approaching. His right shoulder was swollen to twice its normal size by the force of

During the summer the chief and his family moved into a new home which he constructed for himself, working during the off hours.

Chief Baker gives credit to the Sonoma County Sheriff's office for making his job easier. He says excellent co-operation by the resident deputies make the work of his men much easier.

Chief Baker joined the Sonoma Police Department August 10, 1946, immediately after marrying a Sonoma girl he had met while serving at the Sonoma Mission Inn when it was in the hands of the United States Navy.

During the years which followed he made a favorable impression on almost everyone in Sonoma. He did his job in a quiet, unassuming manner which attracted attention and admiration. At the end of five years Baker was appointed Chief of Police of Sonoma. He was just 27 years old, one of the youngest of California police chiefs.

the recoil of the shells against his shoulder. He turned to Miller.

"I'm pretty mad," he said, "but I'm not mad enough to fire another shell from that gun. I wouldn't be human if I did."

Miller nodded. "I guess it's no use, anyway. The guards by the cell house think they've moved to cell block C. One of them fired a shot through the door leading from the service corridor of cell block C. They think they're trapped in the aisle. If they are, maybe we can roll hand grenades down it and get them that way."

"You'll never get them that way. They'll take cover under the revetment in the center of the corridor. Once they're there, I might get them with the anti-tank grenades shooting down the roof," Buckner told him.

"Can you stand shooting a few more shells?" Miller inquired.

"I suppose so, standing up. My body will have a chance to fall back under the recoil."

Guards, equipped with grenades, took up positions at each end of the corridor. At a given signal they began rolling their deadly missiles down the corridor. After several had been exploded on each side, Buckner opened fire on the heavy cement revetment. The shells blew huge chunks free, but failed to smash through. Buckner paused, then fired four more shots. He turned to Miller.

"If the concussion didn't get them, nothing will," he observed. As he spoke, a defiant shot rang out from the cell house. The convicts had apparently taken refuge in the cells.

While Buckner retired to Warden Johnston's office to rest, Miller took measures to keep the convicts pinned in cell block C. A short time later a detachment of Marines arrived from the Yerba Buena Island court martial brig to relieve Buckner and his exhausted crew.

As the evening progressed, the battle wore on, monotonously. The tired guards, and replacement detachments from San Quentin prison and Leavenworth shot at shadows. Then, as the night wore on, the shooting stopped. Attempts by the guards to draw the convicts' fire provide to no avail. For the first time in almost 36 hours silence prevailed on the island.

At 9:45 on Saturday morning, after a hurried strategy conference, Assistant Warden Miller entered the cell block at the head of a detachment of guards, their guns blazing. Their only answer was silence. Then, halfway down the service corridor, they found the body of Joseph Bernard Coy, dressed in the uniform of a guard, with a rifle by his side. He was crouched in a firing position.

Only a few feet further on, the earthly remains of "Dutch Joe" Cretzer lay huddled in the aisle, wearing an officer's holster and with Burch's forty-five lying by his side. The one-time public enemy number one had reached the end of the trail with a rifle bullet in his skull. Further down the cell house, Marvin F. Hubbard, dressed in Coy's jacket and armed only with a knife, was found with a bullet in his brain. Coy, too, had been shot in the head.

Thompson, Sam Shockley and Carnes were all immediately placed in solitary confinement where they will await a murder trial, having been implicated in the bloody escape attempt by the testimony of the hostage guards.

Quiet reigned again on the world's most notorious prison. There was more blood on The Rock, but the island citadel's record was intact. The world knew once more that the fortress was impregnable. Escape from Alcatraz was easy. But only on the wings of death.

gleside Station, finished second and Walt Van Dehay was in the third spot.

It was quite a hassle for that second spot as both Schaugaard and Van Dehay were tied with a 292 so the Creedmore system was employed and Karl's higher rapid fire shoved Walt down to the third spot. Being up in the prize winners is new for Walt as this is his first crack at the big prizes and it looks like he is one to be reckoned with this year. Karl turns in a beautiful possible in the bobbing target match with a perfect 400 score being the first time this has been done in any of the matches. It was Karl's possible that gave his team first place in the team matches as they took the lead over the Taraval squad by only three points but due credit must be given to Dunphy's high 293 and to the scores of Southern and Lacau all of which contributed to their win. Willett, Morey, Foster and Van Dehay, of the Taraval Station shot well as a team and were a bit crest-fallen by being in second place but swore by the nine gods that the next match would find them in the top position.

So with Inspector Ed Preston the individual winner of the first match and Ingleside station the winner of the team match we can all settle down until the boys get together in October.

An odd situation arose with McCormick, Scheuer and Busalacch in the Marksman 2nd class when each man came through with a 214 score for 1st, 2nd and 3rd place. McCormick had the highest rapid fire score so was given 1st place. Scheuer and Busalacch both had the same rapid score so it depended on the timed fire score for second place and as Scheuer was a couple of points to the good he took second place leaving Busalacch in the third spot.

gregate show on Saturday, June 5th and Sunday, June 6th with 165 shooters on Saturday when the .45 matches were finished with Milt Klipfel of the Highway Patrol taking the day's honors. Bob Chow, the San Francisco gunsmith, finished in second place and Bob Thomas of the Highway Patrol team finished in the third spot. Evidently the 2700 aggregate pleased the gang so the Oakland Club is thinking of holding another one later on in the year, maybe around October. The only hitch in the proceedings that kinda threw the shooters was that on Saturday there were two .22 matches chucked in for good measure and as some of the boy couldn't make it Saturday (and weren't too interested in shooting the .45 matches) so it dropped their small caliber scores. The Oakland Club officials realized their mistake on this one and promise to hold only .45 matches on Saturday. It was really a work-out for the group in the statistical office and a tip o' the hat to all of them for their speedy and efficient work. Bert Flager, Claude and Miriam Brown, Bill and Dot Archer, Al and Ann Drasky make up this group—and a fine group it is. The statistical office group were not the only families on the lot as there were many kids, dogs, mamas and papas running all over the place finding a good spot for that noontime snack for the 200 or more shooters. The aggregate trophies were donated by Clarence Boles, Merv Given, the Oakland Pistol Club and the Western Revolver Association with the top aggregate trophy being given by the San Francisco Emporium.

A new team showed up on the range from the California Fish & Game Commission being detailed there for their first competitive match and a letter from the team captain read as follows: "Enclosed is a snapshot of the F. & G. Pistol Team which competed in the Western Revolver Club matches at Oakland on June 6. From left to right—standing—Warden E. C. Fullerton, Ass't. Chief Leslie Lahr and Ass't. Chief William LaMarr — kneeling are Warden Will Payne and Capt. Don Davidson." Then he goes on with a few other matters and winds up the letter with "This is a 'baby' team, having previously competed in but one match at Stockton in May of this year. We have not walked off with any prizes so far, but with a few more competitive matches under our belts we expect to overcome the 'buck' and give the boys some serious competition." Signed by Don Davison, Patrol Captain. We sincerely hope that the Fish & Game Commission continue their policy of sending this team to other matches as they are a fine looking bunch

108 KENTUCKY STREET
PETALUMA, CALIFORNIAof men and do credit to our State Fish & Game Commission.

It has always struck me as very funny how the American personage of both sexes and all ages delights in stuffing their faces. No matter where you go—a circus, the movies, pistol matches—it's always the same. "Feeding the face" is the greatest American pastime that I know of and has stamp collecting backed off the boards for a hobby. I delight in the gastronomic hobby myself (as my hefty poundage will attest) which brings to mind that Sunday I saw that big (and I mean 275 pounds of him) good-hearted Gus Corner giving all the little kids nickels and dimes to buy soda and ice cream. Gus says he intends to reduce but finds it kinda difficult due to so many functions that have food for their main course.

After an absence of 12 years from our range the first cop from the Richmond Police Force shows up at the Sunday matches and damned if I didn't miss the guy's name. That just shows you the type of reporting one gets now-a-days—most unreliable.

Then we have the sad, sad tale of Bill Casey from the Sheriff's Office, Mineral County, Nev., who loudly squawks because nothing is ever mentioned in this column about his coming to the matches. Let it be hereby said that now we can say it: "Bill Casey, from the Sheriff's Office in Mineral County, Nev., was in attendance at the matches Saturday and Sunday."

Young John Faletti grabs two medals for himself and was kidded into wearing them during the matches under the sad story that any first medal won by a competitor must be worn on his jacket for the duration of the matches. Young John didn't need much coaxing for that task and for the remainder of the day was proudly wearing his hardware on his manly (?) bosom.

Capt. Jacobs, Ken Kolb and Chuck Young, of the California Highway Patrol have opened classes for the younger shooters up around their section of the country in compliance with the new state law required all boys under 15 to have a certificate from a qualified instructor before he is issued a hunting license.

In order to facilitate matters and reduce statistics to an absolute minimum I will give you the scores of the final day's shoot—in other words, the aggregate winners.

August 8th, '54, as you probably know, the monthly matches were held at the Oakland range and in spite of the opening of the door season on Saturday there were still some 180 shooters interested enuf in targets to show up for the shoot - plus families and dogs. Vern Clayton was on the range bright and early, claiming he got his deer Saturday after about two hours' hunting. Believe it or not—that's wot the man said. Many of the regulars were absent and no doubt at the next match we'll hear all about the door hunting and their graphic narrations of the big one they shot—and possibly got away. And, of course, I couldn't pass up the alibis for the day with Ed Kligerman claiming his scores suffered because all his teeth were taken out the day before. Maybe there's a good joke to be made out of that one, but damned if I can think of one. Can you? Next came Park Smith with the old one of "trying out his new grips" and one gent confided his wife was expecting any moment and he was "a little nervous" because she was home alone. On that I refrain from any comment.

But Charley Payne really had an alibi and it's happened to many of us shooters and will continue to happen as long as people shoot at targets. In the slow string of the Camp Perry match Charley is quite at ease with the first nine shots and hasn't the remotest idea what his score looks like so decides to take a look through his telescope and give a quick check. Ye Gods!! Nine 10's.

"Oh, no!" bellowed Charles and takes another gander to make sure his 'scope is on his target and sure enuf its nine 10's and Charley's first good score since he started shooting. Now that's Charley's and of course you know that from then on he wasn't worth nuttin'. He became so flustered his next shot missed the target altogether. It's a sad story, mates, but it happens at nearly every match. And I speak from experience.

When they told Reid Wilson he had been pushed up to the Expert class due to his good shooting lately he nearly went nuts but in that class he didn't do too badly. Maybe when he gets over the shock of the promotion his scores will be better.

Received a letter from Sim Reinhard, our Redwood City jeweler and I would like to give the whole contents as it's self-explanatory. "After again winning the cap 'n' ball match yesterday, it occurred to me that credit should be given where credit is due, and I want to thank the host of shooters who helped me win. Such sportsmanship should not go unheeded. (In what other sport would you find the following?) I had fired the cap and ball match with the exception of the last shot, when the hammer mainspring broke, leaving me unable to continue. Immediately, the shooter on my left, who had just completed firing, offered and commenced disassembling his gun to get the spring out for my gun so that I could fire the last shot. The rest of cap and ball shooters crowded around offering mainsprings by the dozen. In the meantime we succeeded in getting the first spring into my gun and I proceeded to fire the last shot which, in spite of the excitement, turned out to be a good 10—thus winning the match. Now I ask you, Ross, in what other sport would you find another bunch of fellows that would help a guy win a match?" It is quite a story and very true for I witnessed the whole affair and when I consider there are only 10 or 12 shooters in the cap and ball match it is all the more remarkable as each and every one of them is out to win that match.

For some time now, John Faletti has been teaching his son, John Jr., how to shoot and the boy is doing nicely and already has a couple of medals for his collection. Pop has been laying off shooting thinking maybe the kid would get hot and show him up so wisely decided to quit. Sunday he got the bug, and in the slow fire string of the Camp Perry match shot himself a nice possible which target he had everybody sign—including the son. Things are bright again around the Faletti mansion and pop can get on the line once more, for with a possible under his belt, the kid will have to crack a world's record now to stop the old man's boasting.

The boys from Sacramento were not with us Sunday as they were celebrating their victory in the U. S. Revolver Association postal matches. The Sacramento boys romped off with more than their share of medals and honors, but then they seem to do it every year. It's quite a victory, though, especially when you compete against the whole United States membership.

As you know, Pop Dutil has decided to leave active police work and is on retirement, so the running of the range will be under the direction of Jim Martin—an up and coming range master. Before joining the police force, Jim made his bread and butter as an electrician but decided police work was just as shocking as electricity so joined the force in October of 1948. This was after his discharge from the SEABEES with 18 months overseas duty under his belt as an electrician first class. Jim came to the range in September of '49, working in the pits, pasting targets, scoring and keeping targets in repair. Then he was put in the tower, relieving in the office and on the lines as well as repairing department firearms and reloading ammo. All this stood Jim in good stead for when the competitive examination for Rangemaster was held, this knowledge placed him number one on the list and as soon as Pop left the range Jim took over. Jim is a sort of an amiable kind of a guy and should get along well with the shooters when the range opens again next year for civilian shooting. While still new to shooting by the time July, 1955, rolls around, he should be in a very good spot to see that the range and the matches go along as smoothly as in the past. I know the target plunkers will like Jim because Jim likes the target shooters.

For quite some time now there have been no shooters from the Richmond police department on our range due to. I understand, the city fathers in Richmond are not shooting-minded. However, Sunday Jim Conn, Bert Kistler, Tom Brazovich and Roy Jeopard, of that department, showed up at the range and signed on as a team. While they didn't finish in first place, it was nice to see the team with us and we hope that they will be detailed to every match.

While on the subject of teams, the gang has asked me what has become of that good U. S. Marine Corps team that was with us so long? You ex-servicemen know how those things are. You get things organized nicely and start to do certain percentage of people with no respect for the law. Sebastopol's four-man jail is frequently filled to overflowing during this period while patrol cars run relays to the county jail in nearby Santa Rosa. No prisoner is kept longer than overnight in Sebastopol.

Chief Ellis and his force have an excellent enforcement record. Juvenile crime has been held to a minimum within the city and almost all other criminal who operate within the city are caught before they get well started.

The chief's career started in 1929 as a member of the Sonoma County Sheriff's office. After thirteen years of service three Ellis took a job with the Santa Rosa Police Department for five years.

The chief is a lifetime resident of Sonoma County. His family settled there back in the days when covered wagons crawled across the Indian-infested plains toward the Golden State.

"It's a sort of game with Elmer. He keeps score on how many days he can go without being hit by a car."

MARKET STREET MURDER

By WALTER R. HECOX

Aside from watching carefully for any muscues by the lumbering, antique trams of the Municipal Railway that rumbled and rattled erratically to and from town, Joseph Klein had little thought of danger as he crossed Market Street toward his used car lot on the afternoon of September 5, 1946.

It was 2:55 p.m., and as quiet an afternoon as the ancient streetcars and passing traffic would allow. Across the street the salesman could see six customers awaiting his return to the lot. He dodged past one of the city's rolling relics, stopped to let another sway past, walked on when a third staggered to a grinding, squealing stop, then sprinted to the sidewalk where he mopped the perspiration from his brow, breathed a sigh of relief, and proceeded toward the safety of his office, convinced that one trip a day across San Francisco's main artery was more than any man should have to face.

Klein glanced at the lot and frowned angrily. Four of his customers, all in the uniform of Navy enlisted men, had left and were walking up Market Street toward another lot. But the departed sailors did not bother him long. Used cars were easy to sell and hard to buy and other customers would show up. In fact there were two people still in the lot.

The salesman sized them up. They were tough and weather beaten, ranch workers or outdoor laborers, from the appearance of their hands and rough, wind-burned complexions. They were young men, powerfully built and sullen-appearing. Klein sighed. They would probably want a bargain, and if they had any kind of car to trade in they would probably get one. As he entered the office they sauntered toward the door. King Beeler, the bookkeeper, greeted him.

"Some fellows waiting for you outside," Beeler said. "They like the looks of that Buick, but say they have a Ford to turn in that needs some motor work. I told them they'd have to see you."

Klein nodded. So that was the way it was. A horse trade, and with a couple of fellows who looked like they knew their business. He shrugged. He did not get the short end of many horse trades himself. The two men entered. As they came in Klein decided the older man would be his problem. He was about thirty-five, handsome, and shrewd looking. The younger one would look to him for guidance.

"See anything you like, gentlemen?"
he asked, motioning toward the lot.

The old man nodded. "We like the Buick, but I'd have to get a decent deal on my car. It needs a little work on the motor, but it's clean and otherwise in good condition."

"Before we go into that, I'd like to see your car. Probably . . ." Klein stopped talking abruptly and stared incredulously at the two men. The older one had drawn a .38 caliber revolver and stood tensely before him, the gun leveled at his head. Simultaneously the younger man drew a .45 automatic and held it over him menacingly.

"And we'd like to see your money," one of the bandits muttered. "Put up your hands. This is a stickup."

At his desk in the corner of the tiny office, King Beeler whirled around. The bandits turned on him.

"Sit still, you!" they warned. "Or we'll blow your head off."

While the bandits were temporarily distracted, Joseph Klein saw his chance. Desperately he lunged forward, grasping frantically at the older man's gun. As though warned by some sixth sense the bandit turned a fraction of a second too soon. His gun roared.

The salesman staggered back. A look of anguish and anger seeped over his face and a crimson fluid seeped slowly through his shirt. Briefly he leaned against the desk, swaying slightly, then lurched forward. The bandit's gun roared again, but the wounded man came on. A third shot was fired, and then a fourth. Joseph Klein slumped to the floor.

From his station at Beeler's desk, the second bandit shouted angrily: "What did you do that for?"

"Never mind that now," his companion responded. "I had to. Get the dough and let's get out of here. It's a cinch somebody heard those shots." He glanced at Beeler. "Lay down on the floor, you."

Warned by the fate of his fellow worker, the bookkeeper obeyed. He watched the two men move toward the cash box. Outside he heard the sound of footsteps on the gravel lot. The bandits paused.

"Someone is coming," the young one whispered. "Let's get out of here."

Without talking further the pair gave up their search for money and ran from the office. As they sprinted toward Market Street, Marvin Beckstedt, a mechanic who had been working in the rear of the lot, saw them leave and hurried into the office.

"Joe," he called, "I thought I heard a gun go off. It didn't sound like backfire. Is anything wrong here?" He stopped abruptly. King Beeler, the bookkeeper, was reaching for the telephone. His face was pale and he was trembling slightly.

"There's no use trying to talk to Joe," he told the mechanic. "Look behind the desk."

Beckstedt stepped forward and stared at the floor. Lying before him was the corpse of the man he had thought he was talking to. The bandit's fourth shot had hit Joseph Klein directly between the eyes and he had died instantly. Beeler dialed the operator and asked for the police department.

"This is the bookkeeper at 1617 Market Street. The used car lot. You had better send an ambulance and a policeman right away. A man has just been murdered here." Thoroughly shaken and dazed, King Beeler cradled the receiver and walked unsteadily from the office, keeping his eyes carefully away from the blood-stained body on the floor. Beckstedt followed him. The two men leaned against the fender of a nearby car and placed cigarettes between trembling lips.

As they did so, two other men, equally shaken, jumped into a Ford coupe parked three blocks away on Crocker Street. Without a word they drove east on Crocker Street and then South on Otis. Not until they put several miles between them and Market Street did one of them speak.

"I think we made it all right. Nobody followed us."

His companion nodded. "I guess they thought it was just a car backfiring."

At Central Emergency Hospital, Steward Eugene Howard and driver Jack Lennon leaped into their ambulance and rolled toward Market Street. The deep-throated roar of their siren sent traffic scuttling to the curbs as they threaded their way down Van Ness Avenue toward Market Street. Back at the hospital a young photographer grabbed his camera and ran toward his automobile. "Hurry up, Hank," he called to a heavy set, fair-haired camera man.

"Why hurry?" the veteran responded. "If it's a phony, there's no rush. If it is murder it will wait. Murder always waits."

Officer William Sweeney flipped open the key to the radio transmitter at the Bureau of Communications in the Hall of Justice. "Mission one and two," he said in a concise monotone. "The used car lot at 1617 Market Street. A shooting. Possible murder." He repeated the call, waited for confirmation, then picked up the telephone at his side. "Give me the press room," he requested. Then: "This is Sweeney in Communications. There's a guy that says there's been a murder at 1617 Market Street. That's all I know." He hung up and turned his attention back to the board in front of him. Officer Gil Dowd had illuminated the two little red lights that indicated Mission one and two were out of service.

Above them, in room 217, four men reached for telephones simultaneously. Their conversations were brief and identical. "There's been a shooting reported at 1617 Market Street. Maybe murder. I'll call you when I get more dope."

The ambulance from Central Emergency arrived at the lot and found a small crowd of curious passersby had already gathered. Officer Frank Blennon, from Mission Station, the patrolman on the beat, was already on the scene, trying to talk to Beeler and Beckstedt and handle the crowd at the scene. In the background the shrill wail of police sirens indicated that re-enforcements were coming to the overburdened officer's aid.

Lennon parked the ambulance as close to the office as possible and Howard leaped out the rear, carrying a stretcher. With the driver he pushed his way past the crowd into the office. He bent over the inert figure by the desk. The bullet hole in the forehead caught his eye.

"Not much question about this," he remarked. "But I might as well make it official." He reached for the dead man's wrist.

A boy in his early teens pushed his way through the crowd. Seeing Howard's uniform he ran to his side and laid his hand on the steward's arm.

"Hey, officer," he said, but before he could go on Howard interrupted him.

"Get back where you belong. Can't you see I'm busy."

The boy fell back into the crowd wearing a crestfallen expression. Howard returned his attention to the body on the floor, concentrating every effort in an attempt to find a pulse. Once again the youngster broke away from the crowd.

"Officer, I just gotta . . ." once again Howard cut him short.

"Listen, kid, this is serious. This man is dead. You don't belong here, and you shouldn't be seeing anything like this anyway. Now go away before I turn you over to the police." Howard turned away once more. Using the utmost care, so as not to disturb the position of the body, he began searching for additional wounds. He did not notice that the youngster at his side had stubbornly refused to move. The boy opened his mouth, closed it, then tried again.

"I know who did it!" he blurted.

"What?" Howard, Lennon and Glennan all whirled around at once.

"I saw them run away. I got their license number," the boy told them.

The hospital steward stared at him. "Kid, I don't know how much you know, but if you help at all, I apologize. Now tell it to the police."

"What was the license number, kid?" Glennan asked.

"6 G 9023. It was a dark blue Ford coupe," the boy told him.

"Thanks, son. Now I haven't got time to talk to you right this minute, but I want you to wait here. I've got to get that number on the air. A lot of people are going to want to talk to you in a little while."

The officer reached for the telephone just as the first of the two Mission cars arrived. The officers turned their attention to dispersing the crowd. Glennan dialed police headquarters and asked for the Bureau of Inspectors. Lieutenant Ed Hippley answered the call.

"This is murder at 1617 Market Street, all right," Glennan announced. "Two guys came in and tried to stick the place up and when the salesman resisted they plugged him. I've got a license number." The officer gave what little description he had been able to get from Beeler to the Lieutenant and added the license number of the blue coupe.

"I don't know how good that number is," he told Hippley. "A kid gave it to me. But there is no harm in trying."

The Lieutenant replaced the receiver on the hook and wrote briefly. He shoved a form through a small panel beside his desk, then held it open while he talked to the man at the board.

"Get that on the air right away, Sweeney," he ordered. "Maybe we can get those guys before they get started." He turned to Inspector Jerry Desmond.

"Call Dan McKlem up in the Robbery Detail. Tell him that was a stickup on Market Street," he ordered, picking up his own phone. "Give me Al Corrasa in Homicide."

A few moments later Inspector Alvin C. Corrasa, head of the Homicide Detail and ace detective, together with Inspectors Max Reznik and George "Paddy" Wafer who had been assigned to the case by Lieutenant Dan McKlem of the Robbery Detail, sped from the Hall of Justice to the scene of the murder.

955 ALMA STREET PALO ALTO

There they found the emergency ambulance replaced by the coroner's wagon. Deputy Coroner Ray Brooks was waiting patiently by the body for the arrival of Inspector Gerald C. Fennell, police photographer.

"Nothing much has been moved," he told the inspectors. "I found four bullet holes. Three in the body and one in the forehead. The one in the forehead knocked him off, although any of the three in the torso could have later. It will take an autopsy to tell."

"Any idea what caliber gun," Corrasa inquired.

"I'd say it was a thirty-eight or a forty-five. It was a big gun," Brooks indicated Beeler who stood, still trembling, just outside the door. "He says it looked like a thirty-eight, and he ought to know."

Corrasa took the witnesses aside and questioned them separately while Reznik and Wafer searched the scene for clues. From Beeler he got a fair description of one man.

"He was about five feet ten inches, fairly heavy build, and had red hair," Beeler told him. "He had a fair complexion, a brown sports coat, and he had been drinking. I could smell liquor on his breath."

Beeler was so upset he could not give an adequate description of the second bandit. Beckstedt, who had caught only a fleeting glimpse of the gunmen, could tell only that they wore light gray or tan hats.

When he had finished questioning Beeler and Beckstedt, Corrasa turned to Rodney Smith, the boy who had given Officer Glennan the license number of the escape car.

"They were about 22, tall and wearing blue suits and brown hats," Smith told him. "They passed within two or three feet of me."

Corrasa sighed. "That's the way it is on these things. Three people saw this thing, but not one of the people saw the same people or the same thing. Beeler, you said they were here for some time, can't you remember any more?"

The bookkeeper shook his head. "I didn't pay any attention. Klein handled the customers. They were out in the lot most of the time talking to the four sailors."

"What four sailors?"

"I forgot to tell you," Beeler confessed. "There were four sailors here looking at another car. The holdup men talked to them until they left. I guess they decided they didn't want the car."

Corrasa nodded. "Maybe the bandits had something to do with that. They couldn't pull a job with four witnesses standing by, so they discouraged them and got rid of them." He turned to Ronald Smith. "Where did they have their car parked? On Market Street?"

"No, sir," the boy replied. "On Crocker Street."

"Crocker Street?"

"That's an alley about three and a half blocks from here," Officer Glennan offered. "Most people don't even know its name."

"I know Crocker Street," Corrasa told him. "But how did this fellow see them drive away in a car parked on Crocker Street if he saw the shooting here?"

Glennan frowned. "How about it, kid?"

"I followed them."

Corrasa grinned. "Young fellow, either you are going to be a dream witness or you're kidding us. Which is it?"

"I'm not fooling," the youngster answered. "I heard the shots in the office. I knew they were shots because I've been with my brother when he was target shooting, so I figured something was wrong."

"I stood right by the gate for a minute and then these two fellows came running out. They ran as fast as they could to the gate and passed within a few feet of me. I couldn't forget their faces. I thought it might be important so I memorized the curves and angles of their features. I read somewhere that was how you remembered people."

"After they got out of the lot they started to walk fast. They walked up Market Street to Brady. When I thought they were a safe distance away I followed them. It was easy. When they got to Brady they started to trot again. They would trot for a while and then walk fast."

"They ran down Brady for a couple of blocks and I trotted along after them. Then they turned up Crocker Street. When I got to Crocker, I crossed the street slow. About half way up the block they were getting into this Ford coupe. I didn't have anything to write on, so I memorized the license number. I'm sure I got the right number."

"Didn't they see you following them?" Corrasa inquired.

"They looked back a few times, but they didn't appear to notice me," the boy answered calmly.

The Homicide Inspector glanced at Glennan and whistled. "You know, it had to be a boy. A man couldn't have done it." He turned back to Ronald. "And only about one out of a hundred would have acted as intelligently as you did, young man. When we catch these fellows we'll have a lot to thank you for."

The boy smiled shyly, basking in the famous detective's praise. Corrasa took his name and address and sent him home. Then he entered the office where Reznik and Wafer were completing their search.

"Find anything?" he inquired.

Reznik showed him four empty shell cartridges. "Only these. We'll find the bullets to match them in the victim. At least we know now the gun used was a thirty-eight caliber. The slugs might come in handy later."

"That's right," Corrasa agreed. "We can always identify the gun that fired them in a ballistics test. That will carry a lot of weight in court. A good defense attorney can make eye witnesses look foolish sometimes, but he has a rough time with scientific evidence."

"Speaking of eye witnesses, did you hear anything about four sailors who were in the lot just before the shooting?" Reznik inquired. "They could help a lot with identification."

"Beeler told me about them," said Corrasa. "They might be able to help a good deal, if we can find them. Apparently they talked to these fellows for quite some time. They could have dropped some clue as to their identity."

"Maybe," Wafer speculated. "But it's not likely. They planned this thing and they weren't going to give themselves away like that."

"Under the circumstances they'll help," Corrasa insisted. He called Glennan. "You heard Beeler speak of those four sailors that were here just before the shooting. Try to find some line on them while you are patrolling your beat tonight. There's a good possibility they stopped somewhere else in the neighborhood where they were known. Meanwhile, I'll get a man working on that angle."

Under the supervision of the three Inspectors police machinery moved into gear smoothly. At Corrasa's request the bureau of communications checked the license number that had been turned in by Ronald Smith with the "Hot" files at the State Department of Motor Vehicles in Sacramento. There was no report of the car having been stolen thus far. It was registered to a Mr. and Mrs. R. E. Ellis, 837 Kirkham Court, Oakland, and was a 1937 Ford Coupe.

A telephone call and a personal check by the Oakland police department revealed that the Ellis family was not home and had been gone all day. Whether the car had been stolen and the theft not yet discovered, or if the registered owners were in some way connected with the crime, could not be determined until some member of the family was located. East Bay police pressed an unsuccessful search for some member of the Ellis family.

"It's unlikely that they had anything to do with it," Wafer remarked. "Almost every car used in a holdup is hot. However, they can stand a check."

A state-wide teletype informed police in cities along the highways leading from San Francisco of the crime details and description of the bandits, including the license number which Ronald Smith had spotted on the escape car. A myriad of police watched the six highways leading from San Francisco, and the metropolis and its satellite communities became a giant web in which the fleeing bandits would become enmeshed if they attempted to flee from the city. A web, however, with many loopholes.

The bandits could desert the car anywhere in San Francisco, steal another, and make their way clear of the narrow peninsula before the theft was discovered. They could catch a passenger-crowded commuter train and ride undetected to San Jose, forty miles south, before coming to a major stop. Or they could seek refuge at an unknown hideout within the city itself. Another and sinister method of escape was left to them.

"They might stick to that car," Corrasa remarked, "and try to shoot their way through if they are detected. They parked it on Crocker Street, three blocks from the place they were to hold up. They must have done that to avoid just what happened. And they don't know what did happen. If they did, Ronald Smith would never have lived to tell us."

The homicide inspector glanced at his watch. It was 3:15 p.m. About twenty miles to the south Sergeant James W. Bedford, Acting Chief of the San Bruno Police Department, was driving down the El Camino Real on his motorcycle. Just two minutes earlier he had read the teletype sent out by the San Francisco police. His old friend, Sergeant John North, had accompanied him to the motorcycle.

"You know, the Chief shouldn't be riding a thing like that," North had told him. "Even if he is only in office temporarily while the regular man is on vacation."

Sergeant Bedford smiled. "I need it. I'm going out and round up those fellows who shot the guy in the used car lot. Watch me."

The Sergeant roared away to the end of the block, pulled his motorcycle around in a broad U turn, and rode north for a few blocks. At a convenient sheltered intersection he stopped and sat astride the machine, watching the steady flow of traffic on the broad highway that bisects San Bruno.

After twenty years on the San Bruno police department, the Sergeant realized fully that his chances of stopping the Market Street bandits were slim. But the same experience that told him that the law of averages was not in his favor made him aware that policemen must follow every lead if a criminal is going to be brought to justice. For every clue that was right ten would be wrong, but it was worth the effort if a killer was placed behind bars. The Sergeant watched the speeding cars pass him, then slow down, and grinned.

They would not have lifted their feet from the throttle if they had known the game he sought was wanted for murder.

A Greyhound bus lumbered into view, sped past him and on down the highway, a light coupe following close behind. The Sergeant kicked his motorcycle into gear and threaded his way through traffic after it. It was a 1937 Ford coupe. There was just a chance the number was right.

Before he was close enough to read the license number, the officer was convinced he had made a mistake. Beyond a doubt the driver was alone in the car. He was driving close behind the bus, but seemed placidly confident that all was well with the world and particularly himself.

Sergeant Bedford narrowed the gap that separated them and glanced at the license. There was no sense in not looking. His pulse quickened. The number checked. It was identical with that broadcast by the San Francisco police department. The officer's mind checked the few details of the crime as they had come over the teletype.

Two men. The Sergeant wondered what he could do if he was one of a bandit duo who had just committed a murder and had a car they didn't know was hot. The logical thing was to separate, keep the car, and rejoin forces when they were a safe distance from the city.

"One of them is in the car, and the other in the bus," the Sergeant reasoned. "I can't stop both of them, but if we get one we can stop the bus further down the line. Even if the second one gets away, we'll know who he is and have an easy enough time catching him later."

Sergeant Bedford loosened his gun and swung out beside the car. He mentioned it over to the curb, smiling to himself as he did so. He couldn't think of a more convenient place to catch a killer. The city hall was less than half a block away, and directly behind it the police station.

For the first time, the driver of the car looked nervous. He glanced at Bedford grimly and the car picked up speed. The officer whipped his service revolver into view.

"Get over to the curb or I'll try this on you."

The driver pulled over. Sergeant Bedford stopped a safe distance behind him and approached the car carefully. His quarry sat docilely in the front seat.

"Something wrong, officer?" he inquired innocently.

"Either that, or you're in the wrong car," Bedford replied. "Get out of there and keep your hands over your head. Don't make a false move."

The man let himself out of the car cautiously, hands raised. Bedford searched him expertly, pulling a thirty-eight revolver from his coat pocket. He stepped back and held the barrel to his nose.

"Burnt powder. Been hunting?"

"I'll tell you about that," his prisoner replied.

"At the station. This is no place for it." The Sergeant glanced at the front seat. To all appearances it was empty. There was no place to hide. He turned back to his prisoner.

"Get around in back of the car. Open the turtle back."

The rear of the car was as empty as the front seat. Sergeant Bedford took his man to the station silently, and left him in the care of Officer Edward Doris.

"Watch him," he warned Doris. "He's a killer. I'm going back to take care of that car. You had better get someone on the radio and have that bus stopped. I'm going back to take care of the car."

Leaving the city hall the Sergeant could see the coupe exactly where he had left it. The turtle back was still wide open. He approached it swiftly, but slowed as he drew near. There was something about the car. A strange chill shook the officer's 240 pound body. He moved forward the last few steps reluctantly. A distant sense, remote and obscure, told him something was wrong. For a moment the officer stopped and stood staring at the empty automobile.

Standing there in the warm late afternoon sunlight, he laughed at himself. An officer with his experience had no right to be going soft. He shook off the mood and moved on briskly. He dropped the turtle back into place, then reached into the driver's compartment for the keys.

Again the spine tingling sensation ran through the officer's body. Later he was unable to explain what made him glance over his shoulder. He was told that the movement undoubtedly saved his life.

When Sergeant Bedford glanced into the rear of the car, he found himself staring into the unwavering muzzle of a forty-five caliber automatic held less than six inches away from his face.

The fraction of a second which the police sergeant had to glance at the gun was infinitesimal. Desperately his hand moved toward his own revolver, but it had barely moved when the forty-five roared angrily and sent him reeling backward.

The bullet coursed through his cheek and out the neck, sending blood gushing from a gaping wound. Unaware that he was hit, the Sergeant reached for his gun, staggered, lurched toward the rear of the car in an instinctive effort to seek cover, and spun crazily into the middle of the El Camino Real.

Startled motorists, unaware of the roadside drama, veered wide and cursed the drunken figure that reeled across the highway. The Sergeant staggered back toward the car, spun around in two complete circles, and fell to the pavement, still trying vainly to force his right hand to draw the gun from its holster. The motor of the coupe roared into action and it became lost in the southbound traffic.

A passing truck driver noticed the prostrate figure of the policeman, stopped and applied pressure to the wound, stopping the flow of blood. Another motorist telephoned for an ambulance, and soon the wounded Sergeant was speeding to the Mills Memorial Hospital.

Word that the popular policeman had been wounded passed rapidly through the suburban community and angry citizens reported at police headquarters, offering to assist in the roundup of his assailant.

The driver of the car, questioned by Sergeant North, identified himself as Edgar M. Ellis and said that two armed men had made him their prisoner since early in the day. He said he had no chance to warn Sergeant Bedford of the man who had hidden himself between the front seat and the turtle back.

"If I had said anything then, I would have caught that bullet," he said. "Besides, the Sergeant wouldn't let me talk."

Unlikely as his story seemed the officers were unable to break his alibi.

Word of the shooting in San Bruno reached the San Francisco police via short wave radio. Lieutenant Dan McKlem and Inspectors Corrasa, Reznik, and Wafer held a hurried conference.

"He won't go far in that car now," Corrasa deduced. "He'll drop it at the first opportunity and you can bet he'll stick around San Bruno for a while."

"That's right," Wafer agreed. "No matter what he says, I think this fellow Ellis is his pal, and he'll want to know what happened to him. He couldn't be too smart or he never would have waited for Bedford to come back."

"I can give you some help and let you make the rounds of the restaurants and bars down there," McKlem told them. "If he is going to stick around he'll have to find cover somewhere. Most likely it will be in a crowd."

"I've already got Lee looking for those four sailors," said Corrasa. "My detail isn't large enough to put any more men on this case."

"I'll give you Jack O'Keefe," McKlem told him. "You and Reznik and Wafer and O'Keefe can go. That ought to be some help for the San Bruno police."

When the four inspectors arrived in San Bruno, they found the San Bruno department already bolstered by men from the San Mateo County Sheriff's office and from the California State Highway Patrol. They outlined their plan rapidly.

"It sounds good to me," North told them. "But there is one thing you don't know. We've already found the car. It was only about three or four blocks from the scene of the shooting parked in a lot next to a grocery store."

The officers decided to inspect the car before beginning their search, meanwhile leaving Corrasa behind to see if he could find a flaw in the story of the recalcitrant Ellis. While Sergeant North, Officer Doris and Inspectors O'Keefe and Reznik looked over the holdup car, Wafer wandered across the street to Uncle Tom's Cabin, popular suburban night club.

Inside he glanced around, then wandered to the bar and ordered a beer. Because of the early hour, the place was practically deserted. Caesar Martinelli, owner of the establishment, recognized the San Francisco policeman and started forward. Wafer motioned him away, then walked idly toward his office. The cafe owner followed him silently.

With the door safely closed behind them Wafer asked a question. "Who is the man in work clothes in the center of the bar?"

"I'm glad you finally came," Martelli told him. "I didn't know whether to call you or not. I think he's the man who just shot Bedford."

"What makes you say so?"

"He came in here a couple of hours ago. About the time of the shooting. After a few drinks he asked the waiter for a table inside. He wanted a table facing the door and looking out the windows. He said his wife had a quarrel with him and might come here looking for him. But he has never been here before in his life. Nobody knows him."

"He doesn't look right here," Wafer agreed. "It's worth looking into. Don't say anything and I'll be back with help."

The officer left by a rear entrance and rejoined his companions across the street. He took Sergeant North and O'Keefe to one side and told them what he had discovered. "It's just possible he is our man," he said.

Splitting into two pairs the officers entered the bar and ordered drinks. The man at the center of the bar watched them enter, but, seeing no hostile move, returned his attention to his drink. Wafer sauntered in his direction.

"I'd like to talk to you," he said quietly.

The man turned angrily. "What for?"

Wafer produced his gold badge. "I'm an inspector from the San Francisco police department."

With catlike speed the suspect's hand flew to his belt and came up holding a forty-five caliber automatic which he leveled against Wafer's stomach. His finger tightened against the trigger when a crushing blow to the jaw sent him staggering to the floor. The gun discharged harmlessly into the ceiling and skittered along the floor.

Immediately pandemonium reigned.

Inspector O'Keefe followed the straight right hand he had thrown with a flying tackle. The frantic fugitive struggled desperately and regained his feet.

A patron grabbed the loose gun and passed it to the bartender and shouted: "Hide this and call the cops!"

"Those aren't boy scouts," the bartender answered tensely. "Just stay out of the way."

Wafer followed O'Keefe's suit and threw straight punches at the fugitive's head. Reznik and Sergeant North rushed into the fray and attempted to pinion his arms. O'Keefe stared incredulously at the sharp edge of a bone that protruded through the raw flesh of his hand.

For a few moments the desperate struggle continued while the killer used maniacal attempts to fight off the combined attempts of three men to subdue him. Gradually he tired, his tense muscles relaxed, and a straight punch from Wafer dropped him to the floor. He stirred and attempted to rise, but before he was capable of moving, Reznik had snapped on his handcuffs.

Transported to San Francisco separately the two men stubbornly refused to talk. Ellis clung to the story that he had been kidnapped, while the second man, who was identified as John Calvin Defer, denied all knowledge of the affair. Hours of questioning were of no avail.

The next morning the grilling continued. Confronted by the prisoners, King Beeler, the bookkeeper at the used car lot, refused to make positive identification.

"I don't want to send an innocent man to the gas chamber," he said logically. "I'd rather have a guilty one go free."

Corrasa played his trump card. He brought Ronald Smith from his classroom. The boy was confronted by Defer. He looked at the young bandit briefly.

"That's him. I'll never forget that one," he told Corrasa.

Defer shrugged. He's only a kid. What good will his testimony be?"

Confronted by Ellis the boy said he thought he recognized him, but was not sure.

"Defer was right," Corrasa said. "We have got to have more identification."

His need for further witnesses was short lived. While the manhunt in San Bruno had been taking place, Homicide Sergeant Martin Lee, with the help of Officer Glennan, was making a painstaking canvass of the area surrounding the murder.

Convinced that the four sailors would look into the used car lots, Lee concentrated there. His deductions proved correct. At ten o'clock the day after the murder Lee found a used car lot where Fire Controlman First Class George J. Rabold and Machinist Mate Third Class Owen T. Newman had purchased an automobile. Two other sailors had been with them. The dealer consulted his files and found the name of their ship.

Lee located Rabold and discovered that it was he and his three mates who had been in the lot at 1617 Market St. He, Newman, and their companions, Machinist First Class Louis Antenelli and Electrician First Class Carl Maggard, all gladly volunteered to testify.

First Defer and then Ellis were confronted by the sailors one at a time. All positively identified them as being the men in the used car lot.

Ellis was then taken to his cell and Defer kept for questioning.

"You can see it's all up," Corrasa told him. "Why don't you do the easy thing and confess?"

"How is the San Bruno cop?" the young bandit asked.

"He's going to live."

"OK. Then I'll talk. Ellis and I held up Klein all right. But Ellis fired the shot that killed him."

Corrasa grinned. "We knew that."

"How?"

"Ballistics. The bullets taken from Klein's body matched Ellis' gun."

Convinced that his case was hopeless Defer dictated a full confession and signed it. Ellis was then confronted with the confession, plus the evidence from the ballistics test.

"Give me a night to think."

Ellis was returned to his cell. The following day he also confessed, his confession almost exactly corresponding with Defer's except for minor discrepancies. But the two men were not through with their struggle for freedom.

Frank Hennesy, an able San Francisco attorney, was retained in their defense and he came to court with a bizarre story about black market automobiles and killing in self-defense.

Defer and Ellis told the court how they had purchased a car at black market prices from the dead dealer on June 7, 1946, had returned because they were dissatisfied with the deal, and had become involved in an argument with him. They said Klein had attacked them with murderous intent and that Ellis had shot out of necessity in self-defense. The three additional shots they laid to fear. The jury wavered toward a manslaughter conviction. The two prisoners claimed that a receipt had been given to them by the dead man on June 7, and that they had lost it and its duplicate in Klein's file had been deliberately destroyed.

Corrasa left the courtroom and conducted a short, unscheduled investigation. That night he had a conference with Assistant District Attorney Jack Eyman who was prosecuting the case. The next day several new witnesses appeared in court.

"Where were you on the afternoon of June 7, 1946?" the prosecutor asked the first of these witnesses.

"In Yankee Stadium, in New York City."

"At a ball game?"

"No. A fight. Joe Louis and Billy Conn for the heavyweight championship of the world."

"Did you know Joseph Klein?"

"Yes."

"Where was he on the day of the Louis-Conn fight?"

"At the fight."

Eyman turned to the court. "I can produce a hundred such witnesses, Your Honor."

Although Hennesy continued to fight, his defense fell apart. On December 13, 1946, the pair were convicted of first degree murder and on December 20 sentenced to life in San Quentin prison.

ALMOST PERFECT MURDER

By JACK COATS

(Reprinted from Texas Police Journal)

In the early morning of September 1, as the doleful bells of the Texas State Prison tolled midnight, Walter E. Whitaker, Jr., walked calmly to his death in the electric chair—paying the supreme penalty for the January, 1953, strangulation slaying of Lubbock schoolgirl Joyce Fern White.

So ended one of the strangest murder cases in Texas history.

Joyce, a pretty 18-year-old Lubbock High School senior, mysteriously disappeared from her mother's home in Lubbock about 9 p.m., January 8, 1953.

The last person to see her alive was her sweetheart and fiancé, Air Force Flight Cadet Walter Whitaker, then 20, who, by his own words, observed Joyce looking out the window, as she frequently did, when he pulled away from the tiny white frame house in an old model car which he had borrowed from a friend.

At approximately that moment, Mrs. Lena B. White, the girl's mother, said she heard an undefinable sound from her daughter, which she said seemed to be a hysterical laugh, or a gasp, as if the girl were beginning to cry.

The mother said she then called out to her daughter that "Your boy friend left a little early tonight, didn't he?"

With what the mother described as a half-laugh, half-cry, Joyce replied, "Yes, he certainly did."

Mrs. White said she then heard her daughter enter the kitchen from the living room. After several moments of utter silence, Mrs. White, worried about her daughter's emotional condition in view of the fact that Whitaker was being transferred to San Antonio, called to Joyce.

Again, nothing but utter silence.

Mrs. White said she then arose from her bed, where she had been resting, and investigated her daughter's whereabouts. No trace of Joyce could be found.

The kitchen door, which opened into the back yard of her home, was found ajar. The screen door, blown about by cold West Texas winds, beat out a lonely message to the anxious mother.

About 10 p.m., Air Force Flight Cadet Gene Shoup of Big Spring, Texas, knocked on the front door of the home, asking the whereabouts of his buddy, Whitaker.

The youth explained to Mrs. White that Joyce's boy friends was to meet him at a nearby skating rink to pick him up in Shoup's car. It was their plans, he said, to return to their quarters at Reese Air Force Base, near Lubbock, together.

About that time, a younger brother of Joyce's returned to the home. The three then discussed the whereabouts of Joyce and Whitaker.

Mrs. White suggested calling Reese AFB by telephone. Shoup declined to do so, saying it would be hard to locate Whitaker at that time of night.

Mrs. White then suggested that Shoup remain at the home overnight. The boy agreed.

At 6:30 a.m., the following day, Shoup called the air base in an attempt to locate Whitaker.

Joyce's boy friend was located by Shoup, and upon being informed that the girl was missing, Whitaker agreed to immediately come to the White home.

Upon his arrival, the worried group then agreed to notify other relatives and the authorities.

Mrs. White called one of her older sons, who is a football coach and school teacher at a small suburb of Lubbock, and told him of the girl's disappearance.

The brother of Joyce then notified police, and hurried to the home of his mother.

City police and detectives soon arrived at the home to begin a preliminary investigation.

After questioning the small group of relatives and friends, officers then searched the house and yard, finding nothing.

Questioning was then continued.

The missing girl's fiance told authorities that after he left the White home about 9 o'clock the night before, he drove to the skating rink where he was to pick up Shoup and observed that the rink still was open.

Thinking he had time to eat a sandwich, Whitaker said he drove to a nearby drive-in cafe, ate his sandwich and returned to the skating rink about 9:30, only to find it closed. Whitaker said he then figured that his buddy had proceeded to the air base with other friends, so he returned to the base also.

Shoup said he left the skating rink about 9:30 and went to a different drive-in for a cup of coffee. Shoup said that from where he was sitting, he could observe the skating rink in case Whitaker came by.

After waiting for Whitaker for several minutes, Shoup said he figured that his friend still was at the White home, so he proceeded to the house in quest of him.

That night, anxious relatives called the Texas Rangers and requested that they enter the case. The Rangers questioned all parties concerned with the case, only to find nothing more than did baffled city detectives.

In days following, members of the White family, Whitaker himself and officers investigated all rumors which even remotely resembled clues in the case. Again, no leads were found.

Still later, Texas Ranger Captain Raymond Waters and Lubbock County Sheriff Grady Harrist went to San Antonio, where Shoup and Whitaker had been transferred in the interim. At that time, Whitaker and Shoup agreed to accompany the two Lubbock officers to Texas Department of Public Safety Headquarters in Austin to take lie-detector tests.

Shoup's story during polygraph questioning was the same as his original one.

Whitaker, upon lie-detector questioning, said he returned to the air base near Lubbock the night of the girl's disappearance between 10 and 10:30 in quest of Shoup. Entering the barracks, he said he observed several members of his squadron shooting dice at the rear of the barracks. After looking for Shoup, Whitaker said he then left the base without speaking to anyone.

Whitaker said he returned to Lubbock from the air base to search for Shoup. He said he drove past several drive-ins and other spots where he thought Shoup might be and failed to find him. Whitaker said he didn't stop at any of the drive-ins, or consider the fact that his friend might have gone to the White residence to wait for him. He added that he returned to the air base for the night between 11 and 11:30 p.m.

Intensive questioning by the polygraph operator failed to break Whitaker's story.

Close questioning of approximately 40 of Whitaker's buddies at Reese AFB disclosed that fellow cadets thought that Whitaker came in and out as he stated, but they couldn't be certain.

Shoup and Whitaker, successfully passing the lie-detector tests, were released from unofficial custody and allowed to return to Lackland Air Force Base at San Antonio.

In the days following, investigators and anxious relatives failed to find any clue as to the missing girl's whereabouts.

Eighteen days after Joyce's disappearance, Waters and Harrist still were not satisfied, however, with their investigation of the case.

The next day they again went from Lubbock to San Antonio and asked Whitaker if he would volunteer to submit to a second lie-detector test. The suspect readily agreed.

After hours of questioning that same day by Polygraph Operator Dee Wheeler, who was armed with a few additional facts and increasing suspicion that Whitaker had murdered Joyce, the suspect began to break, although there was no change in his intelligent, somewhat amused expression.

At this point, Whitaker seemed to realize that he had the officers dancing at his finger tips, and that he, Whitaker, was the star performer in the production that was his.

"I have a story to tell you," he said, "But I'm hungry, and I want something to eat."

Officers then took Whitaker to the best restaurant in Austin, where he ate the biggest steak the establishment had to offer.

"I'm still hungry," Whitaker said, whereupon he ate a second steak of similar size. Whitaker then indicated he was ready to return to Department of Public Safety headquarters.

"I'm ready to tell you my story," Whitaker said, "Although I can't bring myself to tell it to you. I have a friend in Minnesota whom I think I could tell."

This request of Whitaker's was promptly denied. He then asked that a girl friend of his, a Swedish citizen named Ulla Lindborge, be flown from her country to the United States to hear his story.

This, too, being denied, Whitaker agreed to tell his story in the presence of officers to a Lutheran minister.

A Lutheran minister was located. The minister's face turned white with horror as Whitaker unfolded the tale of the brutal thing which he had done.

According to Whitaker's own words, "There was another girl involved whom I loved more than Joyce."

In substance, this was his story: "After leaving Joyce's home about 9 p.m. that night, I drove my friend's car to the rear of the White home, where Joyce ran out the back door and joined me.

"Previously, I had told her that I would take her to New Mexico that night, where we would be married.

"I then drove out on a country road less than a mile from the spot where I later buried her.

"We then began arguing about our future and our words grew louder. Previously, she had told me she was expectant. Joyce laughed at me and told me that she wasn't pregnant. She said she just wanted to see if I loved her more 'than that damn Swede.'

"The next thing I remember is wrapping a piece of cord about her neck and watching her face turn blue. I seemed to black out then, and when I came to. I found myself in the back seat of the car with Joyce's body next to me, naked.

"After driving over several country roads, I found a spot where workmen had been laying pipe. After burying Joyce there, I buried her clothing in five different spots, all near the site of her burial."

When Whitaker had completed his oral confession, he was rushed to Lubbock from Austin. Upon arrival there, he guided officers to a lonely cotton patch near Reese AFB, where he said he had buried Joyce and her clothing.

After officers began digging at the spot, Whitaker grabbed a shovel and yelled at District Attorney Travis Shelton, who had come to the scene, "Let me do the digging. You'll develop a good case of heart trouble."

Immediately before uncovering the body, Whitaker said, "I suppose you men know how horrible this is going to be." He was referring to the condition of Joyce's body after it had remained underground for exactly 20 days.

Then, with a flourish, the confessed slayer uncovered a portion of the dead girl's right hip.

It was a terrible, unforgettable sight as the body of the young girl, once pretty and laughing, was recovered from the lonely grave where it had been placed by the murderer whom she had trusted.

Veteran officers shuddered.

Reporters and photographers, used to being around all sorts of violence, stood by with faces of stone.

The crude grave where Joyce's body lay on its side was about four feet deep. Adjacent was what was left of a cotton patch with only a few stalks remaining here and there. One such stalk had been punched into the ground over the burial site, but whether Whitaker put it there as a marker, no one will ever know.

Nearby, in shallow holes about one foot deep were found Joyce's clothing.

In the hole with her underclothing was the cord which was used to choke her to death.

The accused slayer found all of these with amazing accuracy.

The burial site was in line with a recently installed natural gas line leading to a new residential district nearby.

The grave might have forever held its secret if it had not been pointed out by the man who dug it.

Whitaker was then released from the military to civilian custody and was charged with murder with malice. Efforts to procure a written statement from Whitaker failed after the confessed killed replied that he thought his oral statements should be sufficient.

An autopsy performed on Joyce's body by Dr. Marie Shaw, a Lubbock pathologist, indicated that Joyce was criminally assaulted "before or near the time of her death."

After the slayer's formal arrest, investigation at his Hartford, Conn., home indicated that as a juvenile he had been handled in connection with petty thefts, car thefts, burglaries and, finally safe-cracking. These offenses did not show on Whitaker's military record, however, for at the time they were committed the slayer was a juvenile.

Whitaker came from a well-to-do family which lived in Wethersfield, a suburb of Hartford. The flight cadet's father is president and treasurer of a Hartford trucking and storage firm. Whitaker's father also owns extensive business interests in Sweden.

Whitaker was tried for murder with malice before a jury in Vernon in June, 1953. Following three days of testimony during which the state proved through circumstantial evidence that Whitaker had planned Joyce's death three days before the brutal murder, Whitaker was given the death penalty.

The case was appealed three times. In each instance, the Court of Criminal Appeals in Austin ruled that the defendant had received a fair trial and that he must die.

During hearings before the Board of Pardons and Paroles, Whitaker's parents and attorneys argued that Whitaker's was a case of murder without malice, and that he had murdered only in the heat of anger and passion.

It was also argued by defense attorneys that Whitaker was "crucified" by the newspapers, and that he had not been dealt with fairly.

Even during the last minutes before Whitaker's execution, the arrogant murderer, described by prison doctors as a youth with a split personality, maintained the attitude that his parents could, through the use of their money, secure a commutation of his sentence to life imprisonment.

The condemned slayer, who had the highest I.Q. of anyone ever to be admitted as a prisoner to the Texas Prison System, continued to live in the clouds as the final hours of his life ticked away.

The mother of the brutally assaulted and murdered girl even yet sits in her home in Lubbock, stunned with the conclusion of the case.

"With a face like that, how could he have done it?"

Whitaker committed an almost perfect crime, officers say.

If it hadn't been for the dogged investigations and beliefs that somehow, some way, they were right, Texas Ranger Capt. Raymond Waters and Lubbock County Sheriff Grady Harriett never could have solved the case.

Many officers would have been tempted to give up following the completion of the first lie-detector test, conclusions of which were not satisfactory but didn't actually show that Whitaker was guilty.

The conclusion of the Whitaker case truly can be used as an action lesson to law enforcement officers throughout the United States. It is a fine example of officers who didn't give up.

HEAD-ON COLLISIONS

Most head-on collisions occur when some drivers is trying to pass another. Make sure you have plenty of room before attempting to pass, says the California State Automobile Association.

It is far better driving to shift into second when climbing a hill than to strain the car by remaining in high, declares the National Automobile Club.

In 1953, 38,500 Americans were killed in traffic accidents.

WATCH ROAD

Safe driving calls for constant attention to four factors, says the California State Automobile Association. These are the road, the car, other traffic and pedestrians. The habit of keeping constantly alert to these factors will eliminate many emergencies.

CHECK STEERING

The wise driver has a periodic check made on his steering assembly, wheel alignment, and tires, according to the National Automobile Club.

DEMONSTRATIONS

The car demonstration, according to the National Automobile Club, should be comprehensive enough to show all the car's virtues or, possibly, its faults.

SLOW DRIVERS

Extremely slow drivers should keep as far over to the right as possible, advises the National Automobile Club.

SPEED DANGEROUS

Too much speed is dangerous at any time but it is particularly dangerous during the winter season, points out the National Automobile Club. When roads are made slippery by falling rain or forming ice, when visibility has been impaired with drifting fog or heavy mist, slow down and be safe.

TRAFFIC INSTITUTE

The Traffic Institute of Northwestern University announced that 39 police officers have been selected to attend its 1954-55 traffic police administration course.

Franklin M. Kreml, Institute director, said that 33 of the officers attending the course on awards provided by the Kemper Foundation for Traffic Safety, Chicago, and six were declared eligible to attend as tuition-paying students. The Kemper Foundation is sponsored by the Lumbermen's Mutual Casualty Company and the American Motorists Insurance Company.

The two-semester course in police traffic supervision — the only training of its kind offered anywhere — started September 23, 1954, and continue through June 13, 1955. It is designed especially for executive and administrative personnel of police departments and includes more than 1,200 hours of classroom study, work projects, demonstrations, and field study trips. Four main study areas are: non-police highway transportation agencies and problems, functions of traffic police, management of police service, and general education subjects.

The 39 men chosen in nation-wide competition for the 1954-55 course were named after successfully completing a selection process which included aptitude tests, personal interviews, and consideration of such factors as the extent of the accident and congestion problem in the applicant's community and his department's plans for profitable use of his training.

The 39 men represent 20 municipal police departments in the United States, 11 state police and highway patrol organizations, the Port of New York Authority, the Quebec (city), Canada, and the Manila, P.I., police departments, and the Ministry of Interior of Taiwan (Formosa).

Members of the Institute Board of Selection which named the award winners were: Lynn H. Stockman, assistant dean, School of Commerce, Northwestern University; Carl F. Hanson, president, International Association of Chiefs of Police, and chief of police, Dallas, Tex.; and W. Dean Keefer, second vice president, Lumbermen's Mutual Casualty Company, representing the Kemper Foundation for Traffic Safety.

The Kemper Foundation, which has been providing funds for police officers to attend the Traffic Institute, since 1936, gave sixteen $1,650 fellowships and seventeen $500 tuition scholarships for the 1954-55 class. (Four of the officers will share two fellowships and two scholarships.)
